"A distinct and indisputable way of vivency."—Browne: Vulgar Errors, bk. ii., ch. i.

vī-vēr'-rā, s. [Lat.=a ferret.]

Zoöl.: Civet-cat; the type genus of Viverridæ (q. v.), with the range of the family. Body elongated and compressed; head pointed in front, ears rather small; extremities short, feet small and rounded; toes short, five on each foot; tail moderate or long; a pair of large glandular follicles, situated on the perineum, in both sexes and secreting in most species an oily substance of a penetrating odor. All the species are extremely active, fierce, and rapacious, and feed chiefly on small mammals and birds. The genus is an extensive one, and is often divided into groups, to which some naturalists give generic rank. The chief are (1) Viverra proper, including the largest species. Fur rather long and loose, and elongated in the median line of the neck and back, so as to form a sort of crest or mane. (2) Viverricula, and (3) Genetta, containing smaller species, differing slightly from the first group in dentition.

vī-vēr'-rā-vūs, s. [Mod. Latin viverr(a), and Lat. avus=an ancestor.] [VIVERRIDÆ, 2.]

vī-vēr-ric'-u-lā, s. [Mod. Lat., dimin. from viverra (q. v.).] [VIVERRA.]

vī-vēr'-rī-dæ, s. pl. [Mod. Lat. viverr(a); Lat. fem. pl. adj. suff. -idæ.]

1. Zoöl.: A family of Carnivorous Mammals, section Eluroidea, confined to the Old World; P. M. 3 or 4, m. 1 or 2; digits usually 2, but the pollex or hallux, or both, may be wanting. There are three sub-families: Cryptoproctinæ, Viverrinæ, and Herpestinæ.

2. Palæont.: The family commences in the Eocene, in which formation in America Viverravus occurs.

vī-vēr'-rī-næ, s. pl. [Mod. Lat. viverr(a); Lat. fem. pl. adj. suff. -inæ.]

Zoöl.: The typical sub-family of Viverridæ (q. v.), with several genera, having approximately the range of the family.

vī-vēr'-rine, a. & s. [VIVERRINÆ.]

A. As adj.: Of, belonging to, or resembling the sub-family Viverrinæ or the genus Viverra.

"A curious otter-like modification of the Viverrine type."—Encyc. Brit. (ed. 9th), xv. 436.

B. As subst.: Any individual of the sub-family Viverrinæ or the genus Viverra (q. v.).

"All the essential characters . . . of a Viverrine."—Prof. Parker, in Cassell's Nat. Hist., ii. 86.

viverrine-cat, s.

Zoölogy: Felis viverrina, a large Tiger-cat, from India. Ears small and blunt, fur coarse and dull, limbs short and strong; snout narrow, and drawn out like that of a Civet, whence the specific name; color gray, lighter beneath, banded and spotted with black. The skull is remarkable from the fact that the orbit is completed behind by bone, which is quite exceptional among the Carnivora.

viverrine-dasyure, s.

Zoöl.: A variety of Dasyurus maugei from New South Wales and Van Dieman's Land. General color black, brown, or gray; head and body spotted with white, under parts white.

vīv'-ērs, s. [Fr. vivres=provisions, victuals, from vivre; Lat. vivo=to live.] Food, eatables, provisions, victuals. (Scotch.)

vīves, s. [Fr. avives, from vive=lively, brisk; eau vive=running water, because the animals are said to contract this complaint through drinking running water. (Littre.)] [FIVES.]

vīv'-ī-ā-nī-ā, s. [Named after Signor Viviana, M. D., a botanist of Genoa.]

Bot.: The typical genus of Vivianiaceæ (q. v.). Undershrubs with opposite ovate leaves, covered beneath with white down, and terminal panicles of white, pink, or purple flowers. Natives of Chili and Brazil.

vīv'-ī-ā-nī-ā-çē-æ, s. pl. [Mod. Lat. viviani(a); Lat. fem. pl. adj. suff. -aceæ.]

Bot.: Vivianiads; an order of Hypogynous Exogens, alliance Malvales. Herbs or undershrubs, with opposite or whorled, exstipulate leaves, often hoary on their lower side with down. Flowers in panicles or corymbs, white, red, or pink. Calyx ten-ribbed, with five divisions; petals five, with claws often remaining, after withering around the ovary; stamens ten; filaments distinct; anthers two-celled; stigmas three, sessile; ovary free, three-celled; ovules two in each cell, one ascending, the other suspended; capsule three-lobed, three-celled; seeds roughish. Natives of Chili and the South of Brazil. Known genera four, species fifteen. (Lindley.)

vīv'-ī-ā-nī-ād, s. [Mod. Latin vivian(a); Eng. suff. -ad.]

Bot. (pl.): The order Vivianiaceæ (q. v.). (Lindley.)

vīv'-ī-an-ite, s. [After the English mineralogist, J. G. Vivian; suff. -ite (Min.).]

Min.: A mineral crystallizing in the monoclinic system, but sometimes occurring in an earthy form. Hardness, 1.5-2; specific gravity, 2.58-2.68; luster on cleavage faces pearly, others vitreous; colorless when pure, but, owing to the rapid oxidation of the iron, changing to blue or green; transparent to translucent. Composition: Phosphoric acid, 28.3; protoxide of iron, 43.0; water, 28.7=100, which is equivalent to the formula 3FeO, PO₅+8H₂O.

vīv'-īd, a. [Lat. vividus=animated, true to life, from vivus=alive; Fr. vivide; Ital. vivido.]

1. Exhibiting the appearance of life or freshness; clear, bright, fresh, lively; life-like, strong, intense.

"A bed of tulips presents only a glare of vivid colors."—Knox: Winter Evenings, even. 7.

2. Forming brilliant images, or painting in bright colors; life-like, striking, realistic; giving a striking or life-like character or account.

"Being minute without being dull, and vivid without undue effusiveness."—London Daily Telegraph.

fāte, fāt, fāre, amidst, whāt, fāl, father; wē, wēt, hēre, camel, hēr, thēre; pīne, pīt, sīre, sīr, marine; gō, pōt, or, wōre, wōlf, wōrk, whō, sōn; mūte, cūb, cūre, unite, cūr, rāle, fūll; trŷ, Sŷrian. æ, œ = ē; ey = ā. qu = kw.

vī-vid'-l-tŷ, s. [Eng. vivid; -ity.] The quality or state of being vivid; vividness.

viv'-ld-lŷ, adv. [Eng. vivid; -ly.]

1. In a vivid manner; with strength or intensity.

"Full oft the innocent sufferer sees Too clearly, feels too vividly."

Wordsworth: Excursion, bk. iv.

2. In bright, clear, or glowing colors; in a striking or realistic manner; so as to present a life-like picture to the mind; as, a scene vividly described.

viv'-ld-nēss, s. [Eng. vivid; -ness.]

1. The quality or state of being vivid; liveliness, vivacity, sprightliness, intensity.

"The vividness of their scarlet color."—London Daily Telegraph.

2. Strength of coloring; strikingness; as, the vividness of a description.

vī-vīf'-ic, *vī-vīf'-ick, *vī-vīf'-ic-al, a. [Lat. vivificus, from vivus=alive, and facio (pass. fio)=to make.] [VIVIFY.] Giving life, making alive; vivifying.

"Without whose salutary and vivifick beams, all motion, both animal, vital, and natural, would speedily cease."—Ray: On the Creation, pt. i.

vī-vīf'-i-cant, adj. [Lat. vivificans, pr. par. of vivifico=to vivify (q. v.).] Vivific, vivifying.

"Which hath no vivificant nor quickening power."—P. Holland: Plutarch, p. 685.

vī-vīf'-i-cāte, v. t. [Lat. vivificatus, pa. par. of vivifico=to vivify (q. v.).]

1. Ord. Lang.: To give life to; to animate, to vivify.

"God vivificates and actuates the whole world."—More: Philosophical Cabbala, ch. i.

2. Old. Chem.: To restore or reduce to the natural or to a metallic state, as metal from an oxide, solution, or the like; to revive.

viv'-i-fī-cā-tion, s. [Fr.] [VIVIFICATE.] The act of vivifying or giving life; the state of being vivified; the act of vivifying; revival.

"The nature of vivification is very worthy the inquiry."—Bacon: Nat. Hist., § 695.

viv'-i-fī-cā-tive, a. [Eng. vivificat(e); -ive.] Tending or able to vivify, animate, or give life; capable of vivifying.

"That lower vivificative principle of his soul did grow strong."—More: Philosophical Cabbala, ch. i.

viv'-i-fŷ, *viv'-i-fie, v. t. & i. [Fr. vivifier, from Lat. vivifico, from vivus=alive, and facio (pass. fio)=to make.]

"Gut-worms, as soon as vivified, creep into the stomach for nutriment."—Harvey: On Consumption.

B. Intrans.: To impart life or animation; to quicken.

"Which should shew, that snow hath in it a secret warmth; for else it could hardly vivifie."—Bacon: Nat. Hist., § 696.

vī-vīp'-ar-a, s. pl. [Neut. pl. of Lat. viviparus.]

[VIVIPAROUS.]

Zoöl.: De Blainville's name for the Mammalia (q. v.).

vīv'-ī-pār'-l-tŷ, s. [English vivipar(ous); -ity.] The quality, state, or character of being viviparous. (See extract under OVIPARITY.)

vī-vīp'-a-roūs, a. [Lat. viviparus, from vivus=alive, and pario=to bring forth.]

1. Ord. Lang. & Zoöl.: Producing young alive. The term is used in the two following senses:

(1) Of those animals in which the chorion, or external tunic of the ovum, contracts a vascular adhesion to the uterus.

"It is not very easy to conceive a more evidently prospective contrivance than that which, in all viviparous animals, is found in the milk of the female parent."—Paley: Nat. Theol., ch. xiv.

(2) Of those animals the young of which are extricated from their egg-coverings in the oviduct and produced alive.

2. Bot.: Bearing young plants in place of flowers and seeds, as Marica cœrulea. There are some viviparous ferns, as Asplenium bulbiferum. [BULBIL, GEMMA.]

viviparous-blenny, s.

Ichthyology: Zoarces viviparus, a species about a foot long, common on the European side of the Atlantic, ranging into the German Ocean and the Baltic. The female produces her young alive, and these are so well developed at their birth that they immediately swim about almost as boldly as the adults. From two to three hundred are produced by one female, and directly before parturition the abdomen is so distended that it is impossible to touch it without causing some of the young to be extruded. [ZOARCES.]

viviparous-fishes, s. pl.

Ichthyology: Fishes, the females of which produce their young alive, as the result of actual congress, the males in most cases being furnished with intromittent organs. Among these are many of the Chondropterygians, the families Embiotocidae, many of the Blenniidae and Cyprinodontidae, and several Lophobranchs.

viviparous-larva, s.

Entom.: The larva of the genus Miastor (q. v.).

viviparous-lizard, s.

Zoölogy: Lacerta vivipara, a European species, from four to six inches long. The colors and markings vary greatly; the general ground tint of the upper parts is a greenish-brown dotted with black; the under surface in the male bright orange spotted with black, in the female pale grayish-green.

vī-vīp'-a-roūs-lŷ, adv. [Eng. viviparous; -ly.] In a viviparous manner.

vī-vīp'-a-roūs-nēss, s. [Eng. viviparous; -ness.] The quality, state, or character of being viviparous; viviparity.

vīv'-ī-pēr-čēp'-tion, s. [Lat. vivus=alive, and Eng. perception.] The perception of the processes of vital functions in their natural action. (Opposed to observation by vivisection.) (J. G. Wilkinson.)

vīv'-ī-sēct, verb tr. [VIVISECTION.] To dissect while still living.

"The great physiologist . . . is represented standing, and at his feet a little rabbit waiting to be vivisected."—St. James's Gazette, Feb. 9, 1886.

vīv'-ī-sēc'-tion, s. [Lat. vivus=alive, and sectio=a cutting, a section (q. v.).]

Natural Science:

1. A term denoting, in its strict signification, the dissection of living animals, but popularly employed to denote the practice of performing operations with the knife on living animals, with the view (1) of increasing physiological knowledge; (2) of converting speculative into positive conclusion; and (3) of acquiring manual dexterity in operative surgery. In this last sense vivisection is principally confined to the French veterinary schools. By biologists the term is extended to include the performance of all scientific experiments of a kind calculated to inflict pain upon living animals, and having for their object the investigation of the laws which govern life, the processes of disease, the action of heat and cold, poisons, and therapeutic remedies. The practice appears to have been introduced by the Alexandrian school in the fourth century B. C.; and to this practice we owe, among many other benefits, the discovery of the circulation of the blood by Harvey; the treatment of aneurism by ligatures by Hunter; the distinction of the sensory and motor nerves by Bell; the introduction of chloroform; and the improved treatment of cerebral diseases which resulted from the researches of Brown-Sequard and Bernard. Among the chief investigators by this method of research at the present day are Burdon-Sanderson, Greenfield, and Klein, in England; Pasteur in France, and Koch in Germany. (Haydn.)

2. Any painful scientific experiment performed upon a living animal.

"We must conclude that vivisections are not justifiable for the mere instruction of ordinary students."—Westminster Review, Jan., 1866, p. 150.

vīv'-ī-sēc'-tion-al, a. [English vivisection; -al.] Of or pertaining to vivisection (q. v.).

"It is impossible by vivisectional experiment to know which microscopical elements of the tissues of the animal we destroy."—Westminster Review, Jan., 1866, p. 148.

vīv'-ī-sēc'-tion-ist, s. [Eng. vivisection; -ist.] One who practices or upholds vivisection; a vivisectionist.

"Then we are introduced to a certain vivisectionist."—London Echo.

vīv'-ī-sēc-tōr, s. [Lat. vivus=alive, and sector=a cutter.] [SECTOR.] One who practices vivisection.

"It is obviously impossible . . . to yield the required trust in the vivisectionists."—Contemporary Review, Feb., 1887, p. 346.

vīx'-en, s. [The fem. of fox; cf. Ger. fuchsin, fem. of fuchs=a fox. This is the only surviving instance of the old English mode of forming the feminine by adding the suff. -en to the masculine.]

1. Lit.: A she-fox.

"These, from their size, are not difficult to overcome, especially if dog and vixen hunt in company."—St. James's Gazette, Feb. 10, 1887.

2. Figuratively:

(1) An ill-tempered, snarling man.

(2) A turbulent, quarrelsome woman; a termagant, a scold.

"That may be very honorable in you," answered the pertinacious vixen."—Macaulay: Hist. Eng., ch. xv.

vīx'-en-īsh, a. [Eng. vixen; -ish.] Pertaining to or resembling a vixen; ill-tempered, cross.

"So Tom Smart and his clay-colored gig with the red wheels, and the vixenish mare with the fast pace, went on together."—Dickens: Pickwick, ch. xiv.

vīx'-en-lŷ, a. [English vixen; -ly.] Having the qualities of a vixen; ill-tempered, snappish.

vīz-, conj. [See def.] A contraction of videlicet (q. v.).

vī'-zā-mēnt, s. [See def.] A corruption of advisement. (Shakesp.: Merry Wives, i. 1.)

vīz'-ard, s. [VISOR.]

vīz'-ard, v. t. [VIZARD, s.] To mask.

"Degree being vizarded,

The unworthiest shows as fairly in the mask."

Shakesp.: Troilus and Cressida, i. 3.

vīz-ca'-çha, s. [VISCACHA.]

vī-zīēr', vī-zīr', vī-siēr', s. [Arabic wazir=a counselor of state, minister, viceregent, orig.=a porter; hence, one who bears the burden of state affairs, from wazara=to bear a burden, to support, to sustain.] The title of a high political officer in the Turkish empire and other Mohammedan states. The title is given in Turkey to the heads of the various ministerial departments into which the divan or ministerial council is divided, and to all pashas of three tails. The prime-minister, or president of the divan, is styled the grand-vizier, vizier-azam, or sadr-azam. In India vizier was the title of the highest officer at the Mogul court at Delhi; and nawab-vizier ultimately became the hereditary title in the dynasty ruling at Oude.

vī-zīēr'-ate, s. [Eng. vizier; -ate.] The office, state, or authority of a vizier.

vī-zīēr'-ī-al, a. [Eng. vizier; -ial.] Of, pertaining to, or issued by a vizier.

vīz'-ōr, s. [VISOR.]

vīz'-ōr, v. t. [VISOR, s.] To cover with or as with a vizor; to mask.

vīac'-kē vark, s. [Dut.]

Zoöl.: The name given by the Dutch colonists of South Africa to Phacochærus ethiopicus. [WART-HOG.]

V'-moth, s. [See def.]

Entom.: Halio wavarra, a rather common European geometer moth, family Macaridæ. Antennæ of the male pectinated, those of the female simple. Wings gray, tinged with a faint iridescence or purple gloss; the fore wings streaked, and having four conspicuous spots, the second one shaped like a V, whence the name. The caterpillar feeds on the gooseberry.

vō-and-zeī'-a, s. [From the Malagasy name.]

Bot.: A genus of Phaseolæ. Voandzeia subterranea has at last subterranean fruit. It is a native of Africa, but is cultivated also in America for its eatable seeds and legumes.

vōc'-a-ble, s. [Fr., from Latin vocabulum=an appellation, designation, or name, from voco=to call, from vox (genit. vocis)=the voice (q. v.).] A word, a term, a name; specif., a word considered as composed of certain sounds or letters, without regard to its meaning.

"To conjure with the magic vocables 'peace,' 'liberty,' and 'humanity.'"—London Daily Telegraph.

vō-cāb'-u-lar-ŷ, s. [Fr. vocabulaire, from vocabule=a vocabule (q. v.).]

1. A list or collection of the words of a language, arranged in alphabetical order, and briefly explained; a dictionary, a lexicon, a word-book.

"A vocabulary made after this fashion would with more ease, and in less time, teach the true signification of many terms."—Locke: Human Understand., bk. iii, ch. ii.

2. The sum or stock of words used in a language; the range of words employed in a particular profession, trade or branch of science.

"Their structure and vocabulary have been fully illustrated by Schiefner and F. Müller."—Athenæum, Dec. 20, 1884.

¶ For the difference between vocabulary and dictionary see DICTIONARY.

vō-cāb'-u-līst, subst. [Eng. vocabul(ary); -ist.] The writer or compiler of a vocabulary.

vō'-cal, *vō'-call, a. & s. [Fr. vocal, from Lat. vocalis=sonorous, vocal, from vox (genit. vocis)=the voice.]

A. As adjective:

I. Ordinary Language:

1. Of or pertaining to the voice or speech; uttered or delivered with the voice.

"The bells of Rylstone seemed to say . . .

With vocal music, 'GOD US AYDE!'"

Wordsworth: White Doe, vii.

2. Having a voice, endowed with, or as if with, a voice.

bōil, bōy; pōut, jōwl; cat, çell, chorus, çhin, bench; go, gem; thin, this; sin, aş; expect, Xenophon, exist. ph = f

- *12. One who speaks; a speaker.

"A potent voice of Parliament."

Tennyson: In Memoriam, cxii. 11.

II. Technically:

1. Physiol.: A sound emitted from the larynx (q. v.), which is the organ of voice. To produce it a blast of air, driven by a more or less prolonged expiratory movement, throws the vocal cords (q. v.) into vibration, they again imparting their vibrations to the column of air above them. When a note is to be uttered the vocal cords become parallel to each other, and thus more easily vibrate by a moderate blast of air. The true vocal cords and the parts of the larynx which affect them constitute the essential vocal apparatus, while the parts above—viz., the ventricles of the larynx with the false vocal cords, the pharynx, and the cavity of the mouth—constitute a resonance tube. In a voice are to be distinguished loudness and pitch, the former dependent on the strength of the expiratory blast, the latter on the length and degree of tension of the vocal cord. The shrill voice of a child arises from the shortness of its cords in infancy; soprano, tenor, and barytone voices also depend respectively on the length of the cords, those of a man being about one-third longer than those of a woman or of a boy. The breaking of the voice at puberty arises from the rapid development of the larynx.

2. Gram.: That form of the verb or body of inflections which shows the relation of the subject of the affirmation or predication to the action expressed by the verb. In English and many other languages there are two voices—active and passive (see these words); in Greek and some other languages there is a third voice—the middle (q. v.).

3. Music: Voices may be arranged in six orders or classes, according to gravity or acuteness, viz., the bass, barytone, tenor, alto, or contralto, mezzo-soprano, and soprano (see these words). The first three are the natural voices of men, and the second three those of women. The compass or range of notes is different in each voice, but it is not compass alone which determines the class to which any voice may belong, as very frequently a barytone quality of voice is limited to the range of a bass, and a tenor quality to the compass of a barytone.

4. Phonetics: Sound uttered with resonance of the vocal chords, and not with a mere emission of breath; sonant utterance.

†(1) In my voice: In my name. (Shakesp.: Measure for Measure, i. 3.)

(2) With one voice: Unanimously.

"The Greekish heads, which, with one voice, Call Agamemnon head and general."

Shakesp.: Troilus and Cressida, i. 3.

Composition: The same as that of biotite (q. v.), with the addition of water. Dana suggests that it is probably the latter mineral hydrated.

voire (as vwâr) dire, s. [O. Fr.=to say the truth, from Lat. verum dicere.]

Law: An oath administered to a witness either before or after being sworn in chief, requiring him to speak the truth, or make true answers in reference to matters inquired of, to ascertain his interest in the cause as affecting his competency. (Greenleaf.)

vōi-sîn-age (age as îg), s. [Fr., from voisin=neighboring, from Lat. vicinus.] Neighborhood, vicinage.

vōi'-ture, s. [Fr., from Ital. vettura (q. v.).] [VECTURE.] A carriage.

"They ought to use exercise by voiture or carriage."—Arbuthnot.

vōi'-a-ble, a. [Prob. for voluble (q. v.), which is the reading of the folios and second quarto, or a coinage from Latin volō=to fly.] Nimblewitted. (Shakesp.: Love's Labor's Lost, iii.)

vō-lā'-cious, a. [Lat. volō=to fly.] Apt or fit to fly.

vo-lage, a. [Fr., from voler; Lat. volō=to fly.] Light, giddy, fickle. (Chaucer.)

vō-lā'-ille (lle silent), s. [Fr.]

Cookery: Chicken, fowl.

¶ Suprême de Volaille: The white meat of the breast. [VELOUTÉ.]

vō-lant, a. & s. [Fr., pr. par. of voler; Lat. volō=to fly.]

A. As adjective:

*I. Ordinary Language:

1. Passing through the air; flying.

"In manner of a star volant in the air."—P. Holland: Plutarch, p. 525.

2. Freely circulating or passing from place to place; current.

"The English silver was now current, and our gold volant in the Pope's court."—Fuller.

3. Light and quick; nimble, active, rapid.

"Blind British bards with volant touch Traverse loquacious strings."

J. Phillips: Cider, ii.

II. Her.: Applied to a bird, &c., represented as flying or having the wings spread as in flight.

*B. As subst.: A shuttlecock; hence, one who fluctuates between two parties; a trimmer.

"The Dutch had acted the volant."—North: Examen, p. 474.

*volant-piece, s.

Old Arm.: An extra plate of metal affixed to the front of a knight's helmet, and screwed to the grandegarde, which covered the breast. It was chiefly used in tournaments, and being made with a sharp salient angle, the lance of the opponent, unless provided with a coronel, was almost certain to glance off.

Vōi'-a-pūk', subst. [From two words in the new language, vōi=world, universe, and pūk=speech, discourse, language.] An attempt to form a universal language by Johann Maria Schleyer, a German priest, by a selection of words from most of the European languages, English in particular. The difficulties of pronunciation are obviated by making each letter have only one sound, and words are always written as they are pronounced, and pronounced as they are written. The alphabet consists of twenty-seven letters, eight being vowels and nineteen consonants. The consonants are sounded as in English, with the exception of c, which always has the sound of ch as in child; j, which always has the sound of sh, as in shade; and g, which is always hard; h is used as an aspirate. The accent is invariably on the last syllable, and to the simple French construction is added the advantage of only one conjugation, and there are no irregular verbs or artificial genders. The method of derivation is always the same. The adjectives, verbs, and adverbs being regularly formed from the substantive and analogous in termination, a knowledge of all the nouns practically means the acquirement of the language. W becomes v, and, for the benefit of eastern people to whom the pronunciation of r is always a stumbling-block, l is generally substituted for it. The words are generally reduced to one syllable; thus fat=father, dol (Lat. dolor)=pain, gan (Ger. gans)=goose. Nouns have but one declension and only four cases; gender is indicated by the prefix of; thus, tidel=schoolmaster, of-tidel=schoolmistress. Adjectives are formed by adding ik to the substantives, and adverbs by adding o to the adjectives; thus, fam=glory, famik=glorious, famiko=gloriously.

"This much may be said for Volapük, that although it is only a year or two since it was first invented, 500,000 persons are already said to be using it."—Pall Mall Gazette.

Vōi'-a-pūk'-ist, s. [English Volapük; -ist.] An advocate of the adoption of Volapük as a universal language, by means of which men speaking different languages may correspond with each other.

"The Volapükists have thirteen newspapers in different parts of the world, printed in the new idiom."—Pall Mall Gazette.

vō-lar, a. [Lat. vola=the palm of the hand.]

Anat.: Of or belonging to the palm of the hand; as, the volar artery.

vō-lar-ŷ, subst. [VOLERY.] A bird-cage, large enough for birds to fly about in.

"And now sits penitent and solitary,
Like the forsaken turtle in the volary."

Ben Jonson: New Inn, v. i.

vōi'-a-tile, a. & s. [Fr. volatil, from Lat. volatilis, from volatus=flight, from volō=to fly; Sp. & Port. volatil; Ital. volatile.]

A. As adjective:

*1. Passing through the air on wings; flying.

"There is no creature only volatile, or no flying animal but hath feet as well as wings."—Ray: On the Creation.

2. Having the quality of evaporating or of passing off by spontaneous evaporation; diffusing more or less freely in the atmosphere, as alcohol, ether, essential oils, &c.

3. Lively, sprightly, brisk, gay; hence, fickle, apt to change; thoughtless, giddy.

"Gay, volatile, ingenious, quick to learn."

Wordsworth: Excursion, bk. vi.

*4. Transient; not permanent; not lasting.

"Volatile and fugitive instances of repentance."—Bp. Taylor: Of Repentance, ch. v., § 6.

*B. As subst.: A winged creature.

"Four footid beestis and crepinge beestis and volatilis of heuene."—Wycliffe: Dedit xi.

volatile-liquids, s. pl. [LIQUID, s., I. 1 ¶.]

volatile-oils, s. pl.

Chem.: Essential oils; oils which can be distilled without decomposition. They are classed under two heads: mineral and vegetable; the former being composed of carbon and hydrogen, and generically known as paraffins. The vegetable oils, which are generally procured by distilling the odoriferous substance with water, may be divided into three great classes: (1) Oils composed of carbon and hydrogen (binary volatile oils), of which oil of turpentine may be considered the type; (2) oils containing carbon, hydrogen, and oxygen (oxygenated oils), which include most of those used in medicine and perfumery; and (3) oils containing sulphur (sulphuretted oils), characterized by their extreme pungency and suffocating odor, such as oil of mustard, asafoetida, &c. The volatile oils are generally more limpid and less unctuous than the fixed oils, and are almost colorless after rectification. They are soluble in alcohol and ether, slightly soluble in water, and mix in all proportions with the fixed oils.

vōi'-a-tile-ness, s. [Eng. volatile; -ness.] The quality or state of being volatile; volatility.

"The animal spirits cannot, by reason of their subtilty and volatileness, be discovered to the sense."—Hale.

vōi'-a-tīl'-i-tŷ, s. [Fr. volatilité, from volatil=volatile (q. v.).]

1. The quality or state of being volatile; disposition to evaporate; that quality of a substance which disposes it to diffuse itself more or less rapidly in the atmosphere; capability of diffusing, evaporating, or dissipating at ordinary atmospheric temperatures.

"That pure, elaborated oil, which, by reason of its extreme volatility, exhales spontaneously."—Arbuthnot.

2. The quality or state of being volatile, flighty, giddy, or fickle; flightiness, thoughtlessness; light or thoughtless behavior.

vōi'-a-tīl'-iz'-a-ble, a. [Eng. volatiz(e); -able.] Capable of being volatilized.

vōi'-a-tīl'-i-zā'-tion, adj. [English volatiliz(e); -ation.] The act or process of volatilizing or rendering volatile; the state of being volatilized.

"The volatilization of the salt of tartar."—Boyle Works, ii. 122.

vōi'-a-tīl'-ize, v. t. [Eng. volatil(e); -ize.] To render volatile; to cause to exhale, evaporate, or pass off in vapor or invisible effluvia, and to rise and float in the air.

"Many learned men . . . do not think it credible that at least corporal gold should be volatilized by quicksilver."—Boyle: Works, i. 648.

vol-au-vent (as vol-ō-vān'), s. [Fr.=a puff of wind.]

Cook.: A raised pie made with a case of very light and rich puff paste; a kind of enlarged and highly-ornamented patty.

vōi'-bōrth-ite, s. [After Dr. A. Volborth; suff. -ite (Min.).]

Min.: A mineral occurring in small tabular crystals on a sandstone of the Permian formation in the Urals. Crystallization, hexagonal; hardness, 3-3.5; specific gravity, 3.55; luster, pearly; color, olive-green, citron-yellow; streak, yellowish-green. Analyses made by Genth gave results which justified the following formula: $(\text{Cu}, \text{Ba}, \text{Ca})_3 \text{V}_2 \text{O}_8 + 3\text{CuH}_2\text{O}_2 + 12\text{aq.}$, which requires, vanadic acid, 19.63; protoxide of copper, 38.41; baryta, 6.17; lime, 6.77; water, 29.02=100.

vōi'-cā'-nī-an, a. [Eng. volcan(o); -ian.] Of, pertaining to, or resembling a volcano; volcanic.

"A deep volcanic yellow."—Keats: Lamia.

vōi'-cān'-ic, a. [Fr. volcanique.] Pertaining to a volcano; proceeding from or produced by a volcano; resembling a volcano.

"Its situation is romantic, at the foot of a volcano mountain."—Field, Feb. 4, 1888.

Geol.: The influence exerted by the heated interior of the earth on its external covering. (Lyell) [VULCANISM.]

volcanic-ash, s.

Petrol.: An ash-like substance derived from the attrition of volcanic scoria by the explosion of steam and gases in volcanic craters. The indurated volcanic ashes of early geological periods have had a similar origin.

Petrology: A name given to semi-fused, rounded masses of rocks, of various mineral composition, sometimes ejected from volcanic craters during eruptions. [BOMB, II. 2.]

volcanic-breccia, s.

Petrol.: A breccia formed by the consolidation of angular fragments of volcanic rocks. (Lyell.)

volcanic-dike, s. [DIKE, s., II. 1.]

volcanic-foci, s. pl.

Geol.: The subterranean centers of action in volcanoes, where the heat is supposed to be in the highest degree of energy. (Lyell.)

volcanic-glass, s.

Petrol.: The same as OBSIDIAN (q. v.).

volcanic-mud, s. [MOYA.]

volcanic-regions, s. pl.

Geology & Geog.: Certain regions of the world throughout which volcanic and earthquake action specially prevails. They run in lines. The region of the Andes extends from lat. 43° South to 2° North; that of Mexico follows, then that of the West Indies. Another extends from the Aleutian Islands to the Moluccas and the Isles of Sunda, another from Central Asia to the Canary Islands and the Azores. There is one in the Grecian Archipelago, having its chief focus at Santorin, known to have been active at intervals for two thousand years; then that of Italy and Sicily, having vents in Etna, Vesuvius, and Ischia. One region is in Iceland, with Hecla as its chief vent. Volcanoes are generally near the sea. Jorullo, in Mexico, is, however, an exception, being 120 miles from the nearest ocean.

fāte, fāt, fāre, amidst, whāt, fāll, father; wē, wēt, hēre, camēl, hēr, thēre; pīne, pīt, sīre, sīr, marīne; gō, pōt, or, wōre, wōlf, wōrk, whō, sōn; mūte, cūb, cūre, unite, cūr, rūle, fūll; trŷ, Sŷrian. æ, œ = ē; ey = ā. qu = kw volcanic-rocks, s. pl.

Geol.: Rocks which have been produced at or near the surface of the earth in ancient or modern times by the action of subterranean heat, by water, and pressure. (Lyell.) They form one of the leading divisions of rocks, and resemble Plutonic rocks (q. v.) in being generally unstratified and destitute of fossils, but are distinguished from them. Volcanic are more partially distributed than aqueous rocks. Old volcanic rocks are so nearly identical with the products of modern volcanoes, that the two were undoubtedly produced in a similar manner. The leading volcanic rocks are basalt, andesite, and trachyte.

Volcanic Rocks.

(At the Cascade, Bains du Mont Dore, Puy-de-Dôme, France.)

a. Earthy trachyte; b. Tuff, with pumice, &c.; c. Augitic phonolite; d. Basaltic breccia; e. Basalt, highly ferruginous; f. Trachytic tuff.

volcanic-sand, s.

Geology: Sand ejected from a crater. It differs from ash in having a coarser grain. The puzzolana of Naples is volcanic-sand.

volcanic-soil, subst. Soil largely consisting of the decomposed products of eruption. It is well adapted for wine-growing.

völ-căn'-ic-al-ly, adv. [Eng. volcanic; -al, -ly.] Like a volcano.

"Blasted asunder volcanically."—Carlyle: Heroes, lect. iv., p. 187.

völ-căn-ic'-i-tý, s. [Eng. volcanic; -ity.] The quality or state of being volcanic; volcanic power.

völ'-căn-ism, s. [Eng. volcan(o); -ism.] Volcanicity.

völ'-căn-ist, s. [Eng. volcan(o); -ist.]

1. One versed in the history and phenomena of volcanoes.
2. A vulcanist (q. v.).

völ'-căn-ite (1), s. [English volcan(o); suff. -ite (Min.)] Min.: The same as PYROXENE (q. v.).

völ'-căn-ite (2), subst. [After the island Volcano, where first found; suff. -ite (Min.)]

Min.: A variety of sulphur containing selenium, found in stalactitic forms and as an encrustation. Color, orange or brownish.

völ-căn'-i-tý, s. [Eng. volcan(o); -ity.] The quality or state of being volcanic, or of volcanic origin.

völ-căn-i-ză'-tion, subst. [English volcaniz(e); -ation.] The act or power of volcanizing; the state of being volcanized.

völ'-căn-ize, v. t. [English volcan(o); -ize.] To subject to, or cause to undergo volcanic heat and be affected by its action.

völ-că'-nô, s. [Ital. volcano, vulcano, from Lat. Volcanus, Vulcanus [VULCAN]; Sp. & Fr. volcan.]

1. Geol.: A more or less perfectly conical hill or mountain formed by the successive accumulations of ejected matter in a state of incandescence or high heat, and having one or more channels of communication. (Lyell.) Volcanoes are of three kinds: Active, Dormant, and Extinct. An active volcano is one which still continues at intervals to break into eruptions. A dormant volcano is one which after being quiescent for a long interval, as if its fires were extinct, then breaks forth anew. An extinct volcano is one not known to have been in eruption since man has been upon the earth. The connection between earthquakes and volcanoes is so close that intense seismic action occurs only in the regions where volcanoes exist. [VOLCANIC-REGIONS.] Earthquakes often precede volcanic eruptions, and become less violent when the volcano in the vicinity breaks forth, as if the explosive material struggling to obtain room for expansion produced the earthquake, and found vent in the volcano. Thus a volcano is a natural safety-valve, and saves vastly more human lives than it destroys. The following is the hypothetical genesis of a volcano. Some seismic convulsion produces a deep fissure in the ground, communicating beneath with a lake of molten matter. From this aperture lava flows forth, showers of scorïe or ashes, dust, and sand are hurled into the air, boiling water rises in enormous jets, steam and various gases ascend. Certain of these materials, such as the ashes, the sand, and the dust falling around the aperture, form a tiny eminence, the sides of which slope at the highest angle at which falling material can rest without sliding to the bottom. By this process repeated an indefinite number of times a hill tends to arise of a conical form, and the fissure, whatever its original form, to become a round crater. The first flow of lava from a fissure on a plain would be nearly horizontal, but, as there arose a volcanic cone of material which, though loose at first would tend to cohere, it would descend the slope at an angle. Earthquakes continually upheave regions or districts, and might aid in raising the small volcano to a higher elevation above the sea. Similar action might in certain cases produce what have been called "craters of elevation," but those of eruption are far more numerous. Then when the volcano becomes elevated the pressure of the lava is so great as to break through the side of the crater, and allow the molten mass to escape by a fresh aperture, around which a minor cone is produced. Eighty such minor cones are known on the flanks of Etna. The top of a volcano may also fall in and disappear. A small volcano may arise in a night, as did Monte Nuovo 450 feet high, in the Phlegrean fields near Naples, in 1538, but an immense time is needful to build up such a mountain as Etna (height 10,874 feet) or Cotopaxi (13,858 feet). About three hundred active volcanoes are known. Besides these there are submarine volcanoes, which occasionally come to the surface of the sea, as did Graham's Island, in the Mediterranean near Sicily, in 1831. Volcanoes have existed in all bygone geological ages. Arthur's Seat, near Edinburgh, is an old volcano, its summit being formed by lava formerly filling the hollow of the crater, but from which the softer material of the cone has in some submergence been washed away.

2. Astron.: There are numerous and large extinct volcanoes in the moon (q. v.).

völ-că'-nô-ism, s. [English volcan(o); -ism.] Eruptiveness.

"Blaze out, as wasteful volcanoism to scorch and consume."—Carlyle: Past and Present, bk. ii., ch. x.

vôle (1), s. [Fr. from voler (Lat. volare)=to fly, to dart upon, as a bird of prey.] A deal at cards that draws all the tricks.

"And at backgammon mortify my soul That pants for loo, or flutters at a vole."
Colman: Epilogue to School for Scandal.

vôle (2), s. [Etym. doubtful; perhaps a corruption of vold=field, plain, and hence=field-mouse.]

Zoöl.: A popular name for any species of the Arvicolinae, a sub-family of Muridae, with three genera—Arvicola, Fiber, and Myodes. They are mouse or rat-like rodents of a rather stout build, with the limbs and tail of moderate length, or short, and the latter more hairy than in the true Murines; the ears are short, often nearly concealed beneath the fur. [WATER-VOLE.] Several species range over Central Europe and into Western Asia, but the voles are most abundant (both as species and individuals) in the northern and northwestern parts of North America.

vôle, v. t. [VOLE (1), s.]

Cards: To win all the tricks by a vole.

völ-leê', s. [Fr.=a flight, from voler=to fly.]

Music: A rapid flight or succession of notes.

völ'-lent-ly, adv. [Lat. volens, pr. par. of volare=to wish.] Willingly.

"Ran so violently, so violently to the brink of it."—Adams: Works, i. 237.

völ'-lêr-ý, s. [Fr. volière=an aviary, a pigeon-house, from voler=to fly.]

1. A large bird-cage in which birds have room to fly; a volary.

2. A flight of birds.

"An old boy at his first appearance . . . is sure to draw on him the eyes and chirping of the whole town volery."—Locke: Of Education, § 94.

völ'-êt (t silent), s. [Fr., from voler=to fly.]

*1. Ord. Lang.: A gauze veil worn by ladies at the back of the head in the Middle Ages.

2. Paint.: A term applied to the wings or shutters of a picture, forming a triptych.

völge, s. [Lat. vulgas.] [VULGAR.] The vulgar; the mob.

"We must speak with the volge, and think with the wise."—Fuller: Worthies; London.

völ'-gêr-ite, s. [After G. H. O. Volger; suff. -ite (Min.)]

Min.: An oxide of antimony occurring massive or pulverulent. Color, white. Composition: Oxygen, 19.3; antimony, 58.9; water, 21.8=100, with the formula SbO₅+5H₂O.

völ'-it-a-ble, a. [Eng. volat(ile); -able.] Capable of being volatilized.

"This volitable spirit is soon spent."—Hopkins: Sermons; John iii. 5.

völ'-i-tă'-tion, s. [Lat. volito, freq. from volare=to fly.] The act or state of flying; flight.

"Birds or flying animals are . . . only prone in the act of volitation."—Browne: Vulgar Errors, bk. iv., ch. i.

völ-li'-tiënt (ti as sh), a. [VOLITION.] Having power to will; exercising the will; willing.

"What I do

I do volitient, not obedient."

E. B. Browning: Drama of Exile.

völ-li'-tion, s. [Fr., from a supposed Low Lat. volitionem, accus. of volitio, from Lat. volare=to wish.]

1. The act of willing; the exercise of the will; the act of determining choice or of forming a purpose.

"The actual exercise of that power, by directing any particular action, or its forbearance is that which we call volition, or willing."—Locke: Human Understanding, bk. ii., ch. xxi.

2. The power of willing; will.

völ-li'-tion-al, a. [Eng. volition; -al.] Pertaining or relating to volition.

"To acquire a proper volitional control over the current of thought."—Victoria Magazine, Nov., 1866, p. 95.

völ'-i-tive, a. [VOLITION.]

I. Ordinary Language:

1. Having the power to will; exercising volition.
2. Originating in the will.

II. Gram.: Used in expressing a wish or permission; as, a volitive proposition.

†völ'-i-tör'-ês, s. pl. [Mod. Lat., from Lat. volito=to fly to and fro, to flitter.]

Ornith.: In Owen's classification an order of Birds moving solely by flight; skeleton light and highly pneumatic; sternum with a simple manubrium, in most with two notches on each side; intestinal cæca usually absent or large, wings powerful, in some long and pointed; legs small and weak. They are monogamous, and nest in holes of trees or in the earth; head large, gape wide; food taken on the wing. The order includes Owen's families: Cypselidæ, Trochilidæ, Caprimulgidæ, Trogonidæ, Prionitidæ, Meropidæ, Galbulidæ, Coraciidæ, Capitonidæ, Alcedinidæ, and Bucerotidæ.

völ-kă-mêr'-i-a, s. [Named after John G. Volkamer, a German botanist, who published a flora of Nuremberg in 1700.]

Bot.: A genus of Viticæ (q. v.). Akin to Clerodendron, but having fleshy or corky fruit with two stones, each two-celled. Known species two, one from tropical America, the other from Nubia. Both have white flowers in cymes.

völ-k-măn'-nî-a, s. [Named after Volkmann, its discoverer.]

Palæobot.: A genus of Equisetaceæ, from the Coal Measures. They have verticillate leaves, and at their extremities cones, and are supposed to be Asterophyllites in fructification.

völks'-raad (fólks'-rat), s. [South African Dutch.] The legislative body of the Transvaal or South African Republic.

"The Transvaal has a constitution. By this constitution the volksraad is declared to be the supreme power in the State."—London Truth, April 10, 1897.

völ'-leý, *völ'-lý, s. [Fr. volée=a flight, a volley, a flight of birds, from Lat. volata, fem. of volatus, pa. par. of volare=to fly; Ital. volata=a flight, a volley.]

1. A flight of missiles, as of shot, arrows, &c.; a simultaneous discharge of a number of missiles, as small-arms.

"Welcomed one another with a thundering volley of shot."—Hackluyt: Voyages, iii. 82.

2. A noisy or explosive burst or emission of many things at once.

3. (In tennis and other ball games): A return of the ball before it touches the ground. A return immediately after the ball has touched the ground is called a Half-volley.

† (1) Half-volley: [VOLLEY, s., 3.]

* (2) On the volley: At random.

völ'-leý, v. t. & i. [VOLLEY, s.]

A. Trans.: To discharge in, or as in a volley.

"Hestrove, with volleyed threat and ban."

Scott: Rokeby, v. 33.

*B. Intransitive:

1. To discharge at once, or in a volley.

"Cannon to right of them

Volley'd and thunder'd."

Tennyson: Charge of the Light Brigade.

2. To sound like a volley of artillery.

"And there the volleying thunders pour."

Byron: Siege of Corinth, ii.

3. (In tennis, &c.): To return a ball before it touches the ground. [VOLLEY, s., 3.]

*vol-ow, v. t. [A. S. fulwian.] To baptize.

völt (1), s. [Fr. volte, from Lat. voluta, fem. of volutus, pa. par. of volvo=to turn.] [VAULT, s.]

1. Manège: A round or a circular tread; a gait of two treads, made by a horse going sideways round a center, so that these two treads make parallel tracks—the one which is made by the forefeet larger, and the other by the hinder feet smaller—the shoulders bearing outward, and the croup approaching toward the center. (Farrier's Dict.) [DEMIVOLT.]

2. Fencing: A sudden movement or leap to avoid a thrust.

vōlt (2), subst. [Named in honor of Alessandro Volta.] [VOLTAIC.]

Elect.: The unit which expresses difference of potential. An electrical current is in many respects analogous to a flow of water. The fundamental unit (UNIT, ¶ 4.) is one of mere quantity, the Coulomb, and merely expresses sufficient current to do a certain amount of work. But the same quantity of water would flow through a large pipe at one inch per second, and through one-half the diameter at four inches per second. Hence we get the unit expressing quantity per second (the ampère); and thirdly, as a greater pressure or force is required to drive water at a given rate per second through a small pipe, or greater resistance, so as to maintain a given quantity per second, in electrical currents we have this force or pressure, considered as the difference of potential or electrical pressure at the two ends of the circuit of wire. The resistance of a wire to the passage of a circuit is measured in ohms (units), and a volt is the difference of potential required to drive an effective current of one ampère through a wire interposing the resistance of one ohm.

volt-ampere, s. The same as Watt (q. v.).

volt-coulomb, s. The same as Joule (q. v.).

vōl'-tā (pl. vōl'-tê), s. [Ital.=a turn, from Lat. volta.] [VOLT (1).]

Music: A direction that the part is to be repeated one, two, or more times; as, Una volta=one repeat; due volte=two repeats.

vōl'-tā-, pref. [See def.] Voltaic (q. v.).

†volta-electric, a. Galvanic; pertaining to or produced by galvanism (q. v.).

volta-electrometer, s. [VOLTAMETER.]

vōlt'-āge, s. Electromotive force as expressed in volts.

vōl'-tā'-ic, adj. [See def.] Of or pertaining to Alessandro Volta, an Italian physician (1745-1826). [VOLTAISM.]

voltaic-pile, s. [PILE (1), s., II. 1. (1).]

†vōl'-tāir'-ism, †vōl'-tāire'-ism, s. [See def.] The principles or practices of François-Marie Arouet (1694-1778), better known as Voltaire. He was a bitter opponent of Christianity, which he assailed with merciless ridicule; hence the word has come to mean any kind of mocking scepticism.

vōl'-tā-ism, s. [See def.]

Physics: A term sometimes applied to Galvanism (q. v.), from the fact that Volta's explanations of Galvani's experiments on frogs led to the correct appreciation of the source of the electricity so generated.

vōl'-tā-ite, s. [After the eminent physicist A. Volta; suff. -ite (Min.).]

Min.: An isometric mineral occurring in octahedrons, cubes, and other forms, at the Solfatara, near Naples. Luster, resinous; color, dull green to brown or black; streak, grayish-green; opaque. Composition: A hydrated sulphate of sesquioxide and protoxide of iron, with the formula, $\text{Fe}_2\text{O}_3 \cdot 3\text{SO}_3 + 24\text{H}_2\text{O}$.

vōl'-tām'-ē-tēr, s. [Pref. volta-, and Eng. meter.]

Elect.: An instrument for measuring the work, and thus indirectly the strength of a voltaic current. This is done by the amount of electrochemical decomposition, a certain current reducing a certain amount of hydrogen from water, silver or copper from their salts, &c. This must not be confounded with Voltmeter (q. v.).

vōl'-tā-plāst, s. [Pref. volta-, and Gr. plastos=molded, from plassō=to mold.] A voltaic battery specifically adapted for the electrotyping process.

*vōl'-tā-type, s. [Pref. volta-, and Eng. type.] An electrotype (q. v.).

vōl'-tī, v. i. [Italian, imper. voltare=to turn.] [VOLT (1).]

Music: A direction to turn over the leaf; as, Volti subito=turn over the leaf quickly.

vōl'-tī'-gēur (g as zh), s. [Fr., from voltiger=to vault (q. v.).]

*1. A leaper, a vaulter, a tumbler.

2. A foot-soldier in a select company of every regiment of French infantry. They were established by Napoleon during his consulate. Their duties, exercises and equipments are similar to those of the English light companies.

vōlt'-mē-tēr, s. [Eng. volt (2), and meter.]

Elect.: Any instrument for measuring the pressure, electromotive force, or difference of potentials at the ends of an electric current. The gold-leaf electroscope is a kind of voltmeter, but will only measure large differences of potential. If the terminals are connected with flat plates arranged parallel to each other, one of which is movable, the attractive force between the plates at a given small distance will be a voltmeter. This method is too coarse for ordinary currents, but a modification of it is employed in Thomson's quadrant electrometer. In Cardew's voltmeter the heating effect of the current in a wire, which varies with the electromotive force, and is measured by the expansion produced, is employed. In the majority of instruments the electro-magnetic action is employed in some form of galvanometer. These are more usually wound to act as ammeters, but if wound with very thin wire the high resistance allows the electromotive force required to drive a certain current through them to be calibrated and denoted in volts. Such instruments are adjusted or calibrated by comparison with a "standard" voltaic cell or voltmeter.

vōlt'-zī-a, s. [Named after Voltz, of Strasburg.]

Palaeobotany: A genus of Coniferae, consisting of lofty trees with pinnated branches, having on all sides sessile leaves, in form and imbrication like those of Araucaria. It has also affinities to the Cypress. Found in the Permian and the Trias of Britain and Germany.

vōltz'-īne, vōltz'-īte, subst. [After the French mining engineer Voltz; suff. -ine, -ite (Min.).]

Min.: A mineral occurring in mammillary groups of globules, having a concentric lamellar structure, optically uniaxial. Hardness, 4-4.5; specific gravity 3.66-3.81; luster, greasy, sometimes pearly on a cleavage surface; color, yellowish, brownish. Composition: An oxysulphide of zinc, with the formula $4\text{ZnS} + \text{ZnO}$, which represents: Sulphide of zinc, 82.73; protoxide of zinc, 17.27=100.

vō-lū'-bī-lāte, vōl'-ū-īle, a. [VOLUBLE.]

Bot.: Twining, voluble.

vōl'-ū-bīl'-ī-tŷ, *vol-u-bil-i-tie, s. [Fr. volubilité, from Lat. volubilitatem, accus. of volubilitas, from volubilis=voluble (q. v.).]

*1. A rolling or revolving; aptness to roll or revolve; revolution.

"The world with continual volubility and turning about."—P. Holland: Pliny, bk. ii.

*2. Liableness to revolution or change; mutability.

"And this volubility of human affairs is the judgment of Providence, in the punishment of oppression."—L'Es-trange.

3. The quality or state of being voluble in speech; over-great readiness of the tongue in speaking; excessive fluency of speech; garrulousness.

"The shameless volubility with which he uttered falsehoods."—Macaulay: Hist. Eng., ch. vi.

vōl'-ū-ble, a. [Fr.=easily turned or rolled, fickle, glib, from Lat. volubilem, accus. of volubilis=easily turned about, from volutus, pa. par. of volvo=to turn, to roll; Sp. voluble; Ital. volubile.]

I. Ordinary Language:

*1. Formed so as to roll or revolve easily; apt to roll or revolve; rotating.

"This less voluble earth."—Milton: P. L., iv. 594.

*2. Changeable, fickle, mutable.

"Almost puts Faith in a fever, and deifies alone Voluble chance." Two Noble Kinsmen, i. 2.

*3. Of fluent speech, without conveying the impression that there was a deficiency of thought in what was said.

"He [Archbishop Abbot] was painful, stout, severe against bad manners, of a grave and voluble eloquence."—Hacket: Life of Williams, pt. i., p. 65.

4. Characterized by an excessive flow of words, or by glibness of speech; speaking with over-great fluency; glib.

"An old Communist here interrupted the voluble fury."—London Daily Telegraph.

II. Bot.: Twining (q. v.).

*vōl'-ū-ble-ness, s. [Eng. voluble; -ness.] The quality or state of being voluble; volubility.

vōl'-ū-blŷ, adv. [Eng. volubly (le); -ly.] In a voluble or over-fluent manner; with volubility.

vōl'-ū-ċēl'-lā, s. [Dimin. from Latin volucer=flying, winged.]

Entom.: A genus of Syrphidae, akin to Syrphus, but stouter and less gayly colored. The larvae are wrinkled, and have on each side a double row of short spines, while at the extremity are four to six longer spines arranged in a radiated manner. Beneath are six pairs of tubercles with claws, which serve as prolegs. They reside in the nests of bumble bees, on the young of which they feed. The perfect insect resembles a Bombus.

vōl'-ume, s. [Fr., from Lat. volumen=a roll, a scroll; hence, a book written on a parchment roll; from the same root as volutus, pa. par. of volvo=to roll; Sp. volumen; Ital. & Port. volume.]

I. Ordinary Language:

1. Something rolled or convolved; a convolution, a coil, a fold, a wreath, a roll, as a fold of a serpent, or the like.

"Th' Inachians view the slain with vast surprise,
Her twisting volumes, and her rolling eyes."
Pope: Statius; Thebaid, i. 728.

2. Specially, a written document (as of parchment, papyrus, &c.), rolled up in a convenient form for preservation or use; a roll, a scroll. The books of the ancients were rolls wound round a stick, called an umbilicus, to the extremities of which, called the cornua (or horns) was attached a label bearing the name of the author, &c. The whole was placed in a wrapper, and generally anointed with oil of cedar-wood to protect it from the attacks of insects.

3. Hence, applied to a collection of printed sheets bound together, whether containing a single complete work, part of a work, or more than one work; a book, a tome. In a narrower sense, that part of an extended work which is bound together in one cover; as, a book in three volumes.

"The miscreant bishop of Spalatto wrote learned volumes against the pope."—Milton: Animad. upon Remonstrant's Defense. (Postscript.)

4. The space occupied by a body; dimensions in length, breadth, and depth; compass, mass, bulk.

5. (Pl.). A great deal. (Chiefly in the phrase, to speak volumes = that says a great deal, that is full of meaning.)

"'There!' 'And there!' as he faced about, and pointed his hand, told what writers are apt to term 'volumes.'"—London Echo.

II. Technically:

1. Chem.: The volume of an irregular body may be found from its weight and specific gravity; that is to say, the weight of a unit volume. If w be the weight of the body in grammes, and s its specific gravity, the fraction $\frac{w}{s}$ gives its volume in cubic centimeters. The capacities of vessels are determined by filling them with water or mercury from a measuring-tube, or other vessel whose capacity is previously known; or, when very great accuracy is required, by determining the weight of water or mercury, at the standard temperature, which fills the vessel. (Watts.)

2. Music: A term applied to the power and quality of the tone of a voice or instrument, or of a combination of sounds.

3. Physics: The volume of a body may be real or apparent; the former is the portion of space actually occupied by the matter of which the body is composed, the latter is the sum of its real volume and the total volume of its pores. The real volume is invariable, the apparent volume can be altered in various ways; for instance, it diminishes as a rule on the solidification of the body. (Ganot.)

¶ (1) Atomic volume: [ATOMIC.]

(2) Unit of volume: The volume of the cube constructed on the unit of length. (Everett: The C. G. S. System of Units, p. 1.)

*vōl'-ume, v. i. [VOLUME, s.] To swell; to rise in bulk or volume.

"The mighty steam which volumes high
From their proud nostrils burns the very air."
Byron: The Deformed Transformed, i. 2.

vōl'-umed, a. [Eng. volum(e); -ed.]

*1. Having the form of a rounded mass; in volumes; forming volumes or rounded masses; consisting of moving or rolling masses.

"With volumed smoke that slowly grew To one white sky of sulphurous hue."
Byron: Siege of Corinth, vii.

2. Consisting of so many volumes. (Used in composition; as, a three-volument novel, &c.)

vōl'-ū-mēn'-ōm'-ē-ter, vōl'-ū-mōm'-ē-tēr, subst. [Latin volumen = a volume, and Eng. meter.] An instrument for measuring the volume of a solid body by the quantity of a liquid or of the air which it displaces, and thence also for determining its specific gravity. A very simple volumenometer consists of a globular flask with a narrow neck, about twelve inches long, and graduated from below upward to indicate grains of water. The flask has a tubulure, accurately fitted with a ground stopper for admitting the solid body to be measured. The instrument being filled to the mark 0° on the neck with a liquid, as water, which does not act upon the solid, it is inclined on one side, the stopper removed, and the solid body introduced. The stopper is then replaced, and the number of divisions through which the liquid is raised in the stem gives at once the volume of the body in grain-measures.

fāte, fāt, fāre, amidst, whāt, fāll, father; wē, wēt, hēre, camēl, hēr, thēre; pine, pīt, sīre, sīr, marine; gō, pōt, cr, wōre, wōlf, wōrk, whō, sōn; mūte, cūb, cūre, unite, cūr, rūle, fūll; trŷ, Sŷrian. æ, œ = ē; ey = ā. qu = kw.

völ-ü-mën-öm'-ë-trÿ, s. [Eng. volumenometer; y.] The act or art of determining the volumes or space occupied by bodies; applied generally, however, only to solid bodies; stereometry.

völ-ü-met'-ric, a. [Eng. volume, and metric.] Chem.: Pertaining to or performed by measured volumes of standard solutions of reagents.

volumetric-analysis, s. [ANALYSIS.]

völ-ü-mët'-ric-al-lÿ, adv. [Eng. volumetric; -al; -ly.] By volumetric analysis.

vö-lü'-mîn-oüs, adj. [Latin voluminosus, from volumen (genit. voluminis)=a volume (q. v.); Fr. volumineux.]

*1. Consisting of many folds, coils, or convolutions. (Milton: P. L., ii. 652.)

2. Of great volume, bulk, or size; bulky, massive, extensive, large.

"I am not so voluminous and vast,
But there are lines, wherewith I might be embrac'd."
Ben Jonson: Underwoods.

3. Having written much; having produced many or bulky books; hence, copious, diffuse: as, a voluminous writer.

vö-lü'-mîn-oüs-lÿ, adv. [Eng. voluminous; -ly.] In a voluminous manner; in many volumes; very copiously or diffusely.

"They insisted on them so constantly and so voluminously."—Bolingbroke: Fragments of Essays, § 33.

vö-lü'-mîn-oüs-nëss, s. [English voluminous; -ness.]

1. The quality or state of being voluminous; bulkiness.

"The snake's adamantine voluminousness," Shelley: A Vision of the Sea.

2. Copiousness; diffuseness.

"His works mount to that voluminousness they have very much by repetitions."—Dodwell: Letters of Advice, let. 2.

völ'-ü-mist, s. [Eng. volume(e); -ist.] A writer of a volume or volumes; an author.

"Hot volumists and cold bishops."—Milton: Animad. upon Remonstrant's Defence. (Post.)

völ-ü-möm'-ë-tër, s. [VOLUMENOMETER.]

völ'-ün-tar-i-lÿ, *vol-un-tar-i-lie, *vol-un-tar-y-ly, adv. [Eng. voluntary; -ly.] In a voluntary manner; of one's own free will or choice; spontaneously; without being moved, influenced, or compelled by others; freely.

"God acts not necessarily, but voluntarily."—Clarke: On the Passions, prop. 12.

völ'-ün-tar-i-nëss, s. [Eng. voluntary; -ness.]

*1. The quality or state of being voluntary or endowed with the power of choosing, willing, or determining.

2. The quality or state of being done or produced voluntarily or of free will and choice; as, the voluntariness of an action or gift.

völ'-ün-tär'-i-oüs, a. [Lat. voluntarius.] Voluntary, free.

"Men of voluntarius wil withsitte that heuens gouerneth."—Chaucer: Test. of Love, ii.

völ'-ün-tär'-i-oüs-lÿ, adv. [Eng. voluntarius; -ly.] Voluntarily, willingly.

"Most pleasantly and voluntarily to bear the yoke of his most comfortable commandments."—Strype: Eccles. Mem., Edw. VI. (an. 1550).

völ'-ün-tar-ÿ, *vol-un-tar-ie, adj., adv., & s. [O. Fr. voluntaire; Fr. voluntaire, from Lat. voluntarius=voluntary, from voluntas=free will, from volens, an old form of volens, pr. par. of volo=to wish, to be willing; Sp. & Port. voluntario; Italian volontario.]

A. As adjective:

I. Ordinary Language:

1. Unrestrained by any external influence, force, or interference; not compelled, prompted, or suggested by another; acting of one's or its own free will, choice, or accord; spontaneous, free.

"Almyghtye God of his owne voluntarie will."—Fisher: Seven Psalmes; De Profundis.

2. Proceeding from the will; done or produced of one's own free will, accord, or choice; spontaneous.

"An action is neither good nor evil, unless it be voluntary and chosen."—Bp. Taylor: Rule of Conscience, bk. iv., ch. 1.

3. Pertaining to the will; subject to, controlled, or regulated by the will; as, the voluntary motions of animals.

4. Endowed with the power of willing, or of acting of one's own free will or choice, or according to one's own judgment.

"God did not work as a necessary, but a voluntary agent."—Hooker.

5. Done by design or intentionally; intentional, designed, intended, purposed; not accidental.

"Giving myself a voluntary wound."

Shakesp.: Julius Caesar, ii. 1.

6. Of, pertaining, or relating to voluntarism, or the doctrines of the voluntaries. [C. II. 1.]

"What voluntary churches have done and are doing, in sustaining their own worship and ministry."—British Quarterly Review, lvii. 49. (1873.)

II. Law: According to the will, consent, or agreement of a party; without a valuable (but possibly with a good) consideration; gratuitous, free.

*B. As adv.: Voluntarily; of one's own free will or choice.

"I serve here voluntary."—Shakesp.: Troilus and Cressida, ii. 1.

*C. As substantive:

I. Ord. Lang.: One who engages in any act or affair of his own free will and choice; a volunteer.

"Rash, inconsiderate, fiery voluntaries."

Shakesp.: King John, ii.

II. Technically:

1. Eccles.: One who holds the tenets of Voluntarism (q. v.).

"He thinks that in every district where the Voluntaries are the majority the fabric and the endowment of the Church should be made over to the Genevan Presbyterians."—St. James's Gazette.

2. Music: An organ solo played before, during, or after any office of the Church; hence, called respectively introductory, middle, or concluding. Such solos were formerly, and are often now unprepared, or improvisations, as the name voluntary seems to imply.

"The vergers seemed to have settled among themselves that no visitor to the abbey has a right to hear the concluding voluntary."—London Evening Standard.

voluntary-affidavit (or oath), s.

Law: An affidavit (or oath) made in an extrajudicial matter, or in a case for which the law has not provided.

voluntary-controversy, s.

Church Hist.: A controversy which arose in Scotland in 1831 with regard to the mutual relations which should subsist between the Civil Government and the Church. About the year 1780 a member of the Burgher denomination [BURGHER] published a pamphlet, in which he advocated what is now called Voluntarism (q. v.), and in May, 1795, proposed a modification of the Confession of Faith in conformity with the new views. The Synod ultimately granted the prayer of the petition, a minority withdrawing in 1799 and becoming known as the Old Light Burghers. The same change of views appeared with similar results somewhat later among the Antiburghers. In May, 1804, they superseded their "Act and Testimony," which was in favor of Establishments, by the "Narrative and Testimony," the acceptance of which they made a condition of Communion. Four ministers withdrawing in 1806, formed themselves into the Constitutional Associate Presbytery. The two denominations, which had on one point modified their creed, joining in 1820, became the United Secession. Up till this time, and for some years subsequently, the Voluntary Controversy had attracted little notice, but in 1831 it began to excite great attention throughout Scotland, the leading ministers of the Established Church on the one hand, and those of the United Secession on the other, carrying it on with the greatest ardor. The controversy had far-reaching consequences. To a certain extent it was to strengthen the Established Presbyterian Church on points on which its "voluntary" assailants had declared it weak that Dr. Chalmers proposed the Veto Act (q. v.), with the unexpected result of ultimately producing the Disruption. In the contest on the part of English Nonconformists for "religious equality" they maintain essentially the same views as the Scottish United Secessionists did in the Voluntary Controversy. [LIBERATION-SOCIETY.] voluntary-conveyance, s.

Law: A conveyance which may be made merely on a good, but not a valuable consideration. [VOLUNTARY, A. II.]

voluntary-jurisdiction, s.

Law: A jurisdiction exercised in matters admitting of no opposition or question, and therefore cognizable by any judge, in any place, on any lawful day.

voluntary-muscles, s. pl.

Anat. & Physiol.: Muscles excited by the stimulus of the will or volition acting on them through the nerves, though some of them habitually, and all of them occasionally, act also under the influence of other stimuli. They are the muscles of locomotion, respiration, expression, and some others. (Quain.) [MUSCLE.]

voluntary-principle, s. The principle of Voluntarism (q. v.).

voluntary-schools, s. pl. Public elementary schools managed by voluntary bodies (mainly religious), the cost of such schools being partly defrayed by voluntary subscriptions.

voluntary-waste, s.

Law: Waste which is the result of the voluntary act of the tenant of property; as where he cuts down timber, pulls down a wall, or the like, without the consent of the proprietor.

völ'-ün-tar-ÿ-izm, s. [Eng. voluntary; -ism.]

*1. Ord. Lang.: Spontaneity (q. v.).

"He said voluntarism was a most precious ingredient in all good works, but it needed regulation by authority."—Victoria Magazine, Nov., 1866, p. 64.

2. Theol. & Church Hist.: The view or tenet that the Church should derive its support only from the voluntary contributions of its members, and cannot, without becoming a party to political injustice, losing its own liberty, and running the risk of having its purity corrupted, ask or accept establishment, endowment, or financial support from the State, or from inferior civil authorities. Carried out with logical rigor, voluntarism should also decline to permit its churches and Sunday-school buildings to be exempt from the payment of taxes. This extreme view is entertained only by individuals; the immense mass of those who profess Voluntarism hold that this limited amount of support or endowment is indirect, and need not be rejected. [VOLUNTARY-CONTROVERSY.]

"Elsewhere in Scotland the same conviction has led to a farewell to establishment, and to a voluntarism more consolidated than any other in Europe."—Pall Mall Gazette.

*völ'-ün-të, *völ'-ün-teë, s. [VOLUNTY.]

völ'-ün-teër', s. & a. [Fr. voluntaire = a volunteer, from Lat. voluntarius=voluntary (q. v.).]

A. As substantive:

1. One who enters into any service, or undertakes any duty of his own free will.

"Honest instinct comes a volunteer."

Pope: Essay on Man, iii. 88.

2. Specifically, one who of his own free will offers his services to the state in a military capacity, without the stipulation of pay or other substantial reward.

B. As adj.: Entering into any service, or undertaking any duty of one's own free will; consisting of volunteers.

"A volunteer force of nearly 3,000 officers and men will be engaged."—London Daily Telegraph.

völ'-ün-teër', v. t. & i. [VOLUNTEER, s.]

A. Trans.: To offer or bestow voluntarily, or of one's own free will and choice.

"Agents who had already volunteered their services against him."—Ben Jonson: Poetaster, iii. 1. (Note.)

B. Intrans.: To offer one's service voluntarily; specifically, to offer to serve as a volunteer.

"You'll need an equipage for volunteering."

Dryden: King Arthur. (Prol.)

*völ'-ün-tÿ, *völ'-ün-të, s. [Fr. volonté.] Free will.

"Of his owne mere volunte and fre wyll."—Fabyan: Chronycle; Richard II. (an. 1399.)

*völ'-ü-père, s. [O. Fr.] A cap, a night-cap.

"Hire white volupere."—Chaucer: C. T., 3,241.

vö-lüp'-tü-a-rÿ, s. & a. [Fr. voluptuaire, from Lat. voluptuarius=devoted to pleasure, from voluptas=pleasure, from volo=to wish.]

A. As subst.: One who is wholly given to luxury or the gratification of the appetite and other sensual pleasures.

"In poverty and exile he rose from a voluptuary into a hero."—Macaulay: Hist. Eng., ch. xiv.

B. As adj.: Wholly given or devoted to pleasure: voluptuous.

"Art voluptuary, which Tacitus truly called eruditus luscus."—Bacon: Adv. of Learn., bk. ii.

*vö-lüp'-tü-âte, v. t. [Lat. voluptas=pleasure.] To convert or devote to pleasure.

"'Tis watching and labor that voluptate repose and sleep."—Feltham: Resolves, 43.

*vö-lüp'-tü-ös'-i-tÿ, *vo-lup-tu-os-i-tie, *vo-lup-tu-os-y-te, subst. [Lat. voluptuosus=full of pleasure, voluptuous (q. v.).] A disposition to indulge in sensual pleasures; voluptuousness.

"In the tender wittes be sparkes of voluptuosity."—Elyot: Governor, bk. i., ch. vi.

vö-lüp'-tü-oüs, a. [Fr. voluptueux, from Lat. voluptuosus=full of pleasure, from voluptas=pleasure, from volo=to wish; Sp. & Port. voluptuoso.]

1. Pertaining to, proceeding from, or based on sensual pleasure.

böil, böy; pöut, jöwl; cat, çell, chorus, çhin, bench; go, gem; thin, ðis; sin, aš; expect, Xenophon, exist. ph = f
-cian, -tian = šan. -tion, -sion = šün: -ñion, -ñion = žhün. -tious, -cious, -sious = šhüs. -ble, -dle, &c. = bel, del

2. Contributing to sensual pleasure; exciting, or tending to excite, sensual desires; gratifying the senses; sensual; as voluptuous charms.

3. Passed or spent in sensual pleasures.

4. Given or devoted to sensual pleasures or gratifications; sensual.

võ-lũp'-tũ-ous-lỹ, adv. [Eng. voluptuous; -ly.] In a voluptuous manner; with free indulgence in sensual pleasures; luxuriously, sensually.

võ-lũp'-tũ-ous-nẽss, vo-lup-tũ-ous-nẽs, s. [Eng. voluptuous; -ness.] The quality or state of being voluptuous, or addicted to free indulgence in sensual pleasures; luxuriousness, sensuality.

võ-lũp'-tỹ, vo-lup-tĩe, s. [Latin voluptas=pleasure.] Voluptuousness. (Sir T. Elyot: Governor, bk. iii., ch. xix.)

Võl'-ũs-pa, s. [Properly the lay or song of the Volva, a Scandinavian prophetess, but applied in error by Sir W. Scott to the prophetess herself.] A Scandinavian prophetess or sibyl.

võ-lũ-tũ, s. [Lat., fem. of volutus, pa. par. of volvo=to roll.]

*1. Arch.: A volute (q. v.).

2. Zoöl. & Palæont.: The type-genus of Volutidæ, with seventy recent species from the West Indies, Cape Horn, West Africa, Australia, Java, and Chili, and eighty fossil species, from the Chalk onward, but the genus is mainly Tertiary and recent. Shell ventricose, thick; spire short, apex mammillated; aperture large, deeply notched in front; columella with several plaits; operculum present in a few species. There are many sub-genera; the most important is Volutilithes, in which the plaits of the columella are indistinct, with one recent species; fossil in the Eocene.

võl'-ũ-tũ-rỹ, a. [Lat. volutus, pa. par. of volvo=to roll.] (See compound.)

voluntary-press, s. A clamping-machine (q. v.).

võl'-ũ-tũ-tion, subst. [Lat. volutatio, from volutatus, pa. par. of volutio, frequent. of volvo (pa. par. volutus)=to roll.] The act or state of rolling or wallowing, as of a body on the earth.

võl'-ũ-te', a. & s. [Fr., from Lat. voluta, fem. of volutus, pa. par. of volvo=to roll.]

A. As adjective:

Bot.: Rolled up.

B. As substantive:

1. Arch.: A kind of spiral scroll used in Ionic, Corinthian, and Composite capitals, of which it is a principal ornament. The number of volutes in the Ionic order is four. In the Corinthian and Composite orders they are more numerous, in the former being accompanied by smaller ones, called helices. Called also voluta.

2. Zoölogy. Any individual of the genus Voluta (q. v.).

volute-compasses, s. pl. A draftsman's compasses in which the legs are gradually expanded, so as to trace a spiral.

volute-spring, s. A helical spring (q. v.).

1. A volute-shaped shell, that in revolving presents its open mouth to the air, which is thus gathered into the tube and discharged through the hollow axis. It is a common and effective sort of blower.

2. A water-wheel with radial or curved buckets, in which the periphery of the wheel is surrounded by a volute-shaped casing or scroll, which confines the water against the wheel. (See illustration.)

võ-lũt'-ẽd, adj. [Eng. volute(e); -ed.]

Arch.: Having a volute or spiral scroll.

võl'-ũ-tẽl'-lũ, s. [Mod. Lat., dimin. from voluta (q. v.).]

Zoöl.: D'Orbigny's name for Voluta (q. v.).

võ-lũ-tĩ-dũ, s. pl. [Mod. Latin volut(a); Latin fem. pl. adj. suff. -idũ.]

1. Zoöl.: A family of Siphonostomatous Gastropods. Woodward enumerates five genera (Voluta, Cymba, Mitra, Volvaria, and Marginella), to which Tate adds Columbellina, which Woodward reckons a sub-genus of Columbella, of the Buccinidæ. Shell turreted or convolute; aperture notched in front; columella obliquely plaited; no operculum. Animal with a recurved siphon; foot very large, partly hiding the shell; mantle often lobed and reflected over the shell; eyes on tentacles or near their base. The living members are chiefly from warm seas, and are often remarkable for their brilliant coloration.

2. Palæont.: The family appears late in the Chalk, but is abundant in the Tertiaries, and attains its maximum in recent times.

võ-lũ-tĩ-lĩth-ẽs, s. [Mod. Lat. voluta, and Gr. lĩthos=a stoue.] [Voluta, 2.]

võ-lũ-tion, s. [Lat. volutio, from volutus, pa. par. of volvo=to roll.] A spiral turn, a convolution, a revolution.

"The swift volutio and the enormous train."

Falconer: Shipwreck, ii. 43.

võ-lũ-tĩte, s. [Mod. Lat. volut(a); suff. -ite.] A fossil Voluta. [Voluta, 2.]

võl'-vũ, s. [Lat.=a wrapper, a covering.]

Botany: The involucre-like base of the stipe of Agaricus. Originally it was a bag enveloping the whole plant, which, however, elongating, burst through it, leaving it torn.

võl'-vũr'-ĩ-a, s. [Mod. Lat., from Lat. volva=a wrapper, from volvo=to roll.]

Zoöl. & Palæont.: A genus of Volutidæ (q. v.), with twenty-nine recent species, from tropical seas. Shell cylindrical, convolute; spire minute, aperture long and narrow; columella with three oblique plaits in front. Fossil in the Eocene of Britain and France.

võlve, v. t. [Latin volvo=to roll, to turn.] To turn over. (Berners: Froissart; Cron. Pref.) võl'-võ-çĩn'-ẽ-ũ, s. pl. [Mod. Lat. volvax, genit. volvocis]; Lat. fem. pl. adj. suff. -ũ.]

Bot.: A family of Confervecæ, placed by Ehrenberg under his Infusoria, but which Siebold, Williamson, Busk, and Cohn have shown to be confervoid Algæ. Nearly microscopic plants, composed of many zoospore-like bodies associated into spherical or quadrangular colonies, the separate members of which, connected or held together in various ways by cell membranes, retain their distinct individuality for all purposes of nutrition, growth, and reproduction. They are inhabitants of fresh-water ponds, in which the whole colony is carried in a circular and progressive movement by the vibratile motion of the cilia, which project from the separate individuals through the jelly into the water. They exhibit in their maturity the characters of the transitory zoospores of other confervoids.

võl'-võx, s. [Lat. volvo=to roll. Named from its rotary motion. (See def.)]

Bot.: The typical genus of Volvocinæ (q. v.), with one species, Volvox globator. To the naked eye it resembles a minute pale-green globule floating about in the water. Under the microscope it is seen to be a spherical membranous sac, studded with innumerable green points, really apertures giving exit to cilia, which enable it to roll over and over in the water. Within the sac are various dense globules, generally green in summer, but often of an orange-color in autumn and early winter. They are zoospore-like bodies, each sending a pair of cilia through separate orifices. There is a reddish-brown spot and a contractile vacuole. Found abundantly in clear pools on open commons and similar localities.

võl'-vũ-lũs, s. [Lat. volvo=to roll, to turn about.]

Pathol.: The iliac passion, because it was supposed to arise from a twitching of the bowels.

võme, s. [Lat. vomo=to vomit.] Vomit.

"All forsothe ben fulfilled with the vome and filthis."—Wycliffe: Isaiah xxviii. 8.

võ-mẽr, s. [Lat.=a plowshare.]

1. Comp. Anat.: A small thin bone in the median line, forming the posterior and principal portion of the partition between the nostrils in man. It exhibits many modifications in the different classes of Vertebrata. In Fishes an important character is the presence or absence of teeth on the vomer (that is, along the middle line of the roof of the mouth). The bone is so named from the fact that in man it bears some resemblance to a plowshare. [Etym.]

2. Palæont.: A genus of Carangidæ, allied to Caranx, from the Chalk of Comen in Istria.

võ-mẽr-ĩne, a. [Eng. vomer; -ine.] Of or pertaining to the vomer; situated on the vomer. (Günther.)

võm'-ĩc, a. [VOMICA.] Purulent, ulcerous.

vomic-nut, subst. The nut of Strychnos nuxvomica. [NUX-VOMICA, STRYCHNOS.]

võm'-ĩ-ca, s. [Lat.=a sore, a boil.]

Pathol.: An abscess in the substance of the lungs produced by the resolution of tubercles.

võm-ing, võm-yng, s. [VOME.] Vomiting; vomit. (Wycliffe: Jer. xlvi. 56.)

võm'-ĩt, võm-ete, vo-myt, v. t. & i. [Latin vomito, from vomitus=a vomiting, vomit (q. v.); Sp. & Port. vomitar; Ital. vomitare.]

A. Intrans.: To eject the contents of the stomach by the mouth; to spew, to puke.

B. Transitive:

1. Lit.: To throw up or eject from the stomach by the mouth; to spew out. (Often with up, forth, or out.)

"The fish vomited out Jonah upon the dry land."—Jonah ii. 10.

2. Fig.: To eject or discharge, as from a hollow place; to belch out.

"The volcano, which was about four miles to the west of us, vomited up vast quantities of fire and smoke."—Cook: Second Voyage, bk. iii., ch. v.

võm'-ĩt, võm-ite, võm-yte, s. [Lat. vomitus=vomit, prop. pa. par. of vomo=to vomit; cogn. with Gr. emõ=to vomit; Sansc. vam; Sp., Port. & Ital. vomit.]

1. The matter ejected from the stomach in vomiting. (Spenser: F. Q., i. i. 20.)

2. A medicine or other preparation which causes the stomach to discharge its contents; an emetic. (Arbuthnot.)

¶ Black vomit: [BLACK-VOMIT.]

vomit-nut, s. [VOMIC-NUT.]

võm'-ĩt-ĩng, pr. par., a. & s. [VOMIT, s.]

A. & B. As pr. par. & particip. adj.: (See the verb.)

C. As substantive:

1. The act of ejecting the contents of the stomach by the mouth.

¶ Vomiting is generally preceded by feelings of nausea, during which there is a copious flow of saliva into the mouth. This being swallowed carries down with it a certain quantity of air, which, assisting in the opening of the cardiac sphincter, facilitates the discharge of the contents of the stomach. There generally follows ineffectual retching, during which there is a deep inspiration, by which the diaphragm is thrust down as low as possible against the stomach, the lower ribs being at the same time drawn in. Then there is a sudden expiratory contraction of the abdominal walls, so that the stomach is compressed without, and its contents sent up the oesophagus. The primary origin of vomiting may be gastric or cerebral.

2. That which is vomited; vomit.

"And why may not Pancirone as well bid his servants . . . hold the chalice to beastly vomitings?"—Bp. Taylor: Rule of Conscience, bk. iv., ch. i.

võ-mĩ-tion, s. [Lat. vomitio, from vomitus.] [VOMIT, s.] The act or power of vomiting.

"If the stomach had wanted the faculty of vomition, they had inevitably died."—Grew: Cosmo. Sacra.

võm'-ĩ-tĩve, a. [Fr. vomitif.] Causing to vomit; emetic.

"Glass of antimony and crocus metallorum, being either of them infused in a great proportion of wine, will make it vomitive."—Boyle: Works, iii. 671.

võ-mĩ-tõ, s. [Sp.=vomit.] [VOMIT, s. ¶.] The yellow fever in its worst form, when it is usually attended with black vomit.

võm'-ĩ-tõr-ỹ, võm-i-tor-ĩe, a. & s. [Lat. vomitioria=causing vomiting; vomiting; hence vomitioria (neut. pl.), passages in a theater, by which people entered and came out, from vomo=to vomit.]

*A. As adj.: Causing vomiting; emetic.

"By taking vomitories privately."—Harvey: On Consumption.

B. As substantive:

*1. An emetic.

"Usually taken to the foresaid weight, with honey, for a vomitorie."—P. Holland: Pliny, bk. xxvi., ch. vii.

2. Arch.: An opening, gate, or door, in an ancient theater or amphitheater, which gave ingress and egress to the spectators.

"Sixty-four vomitories . . . poured forth the immense multitude."—Gibbon: Decline and Fall, ch. xii.

võm'-ĩ-tũ-rĩ-tion, s. [As if from a Lat. vomiturio, desiderative from vomito=to vomit.]

1. An ineffectual attempt to vomit; a retching.

2. The vomiting of but little matter; vomiting with little effort.

Võd-doô, Vaudoux (as Võ-dô), s. & a. [Native African=the all-powerful and supernatural being, the non-venomous serpent on whom depend all the events which take place in the world. (Spencer St. John: Hayti, p. 186.) Mr. Newell (Amer. Jour.

A. As substantive:

1. (See extract.)

"As generally understood, Voodoo means the persistence, in Hayti, of abominable magic, mysteries, and cannibalism brought originally from Africa."—London Daily News.

2. A negro sorcerer or witch who practices human sacrifice and cannibalism.

¶ In the Southern States of the union there was at one time a wide-spread and deep-rooted belief in the power of these sorcerers. As the negroes advance in education, the belief is dying away. At one time, however, despite all efforts of religious teachers to banish the mastery of this belief from the minds of the slaves, the Voodoo "doctor" was an almost omnipotent individual in the estimation of his fellows. No slave could, under any pretext, be persuaded to expose himself to the vengeance or wrath of one of these conjurers. In some cases there was a reasonable foundation for these fears; for in not a few instances has it been proven that some of the Voodoos were skillful poisoners, and while the great mass of their professed art was a rank imposture, still they possessed enough of devilish skill to render them objects of wholesome dread. Their methods were as varied and variable as the winds. Anything that was mysterious, or likely to impress the ignorant mind with a feeling of terror was eagerly seized upon and improved by them to their own advantage. Their services were more often invoked in destructive than in curative offices. If a negro desired to destroy an enemy, he sought the aid of the Voodoo, who, in many cases, would undertake to remove the obnoxious one, and the removal was generally accomplished through the medium of poison. No doubt exists that in many cases the victim of a Voodoo died from sheer fright, for whenever a negro had reason to think that he was possessed by the spell of the Voodoo, he at once gave up all hope, thus hastening the accomplishment of the end toward which the energies of the sorcerer were directed. Their incantations and spell-workings were always conducted with the greatest secrecy, no one being allowed to witness the more occult and potent portion of their ritual. They were frequently employed by dusky swains to gain for them the affections of their hard-hearted innamoratas, and love-powders and other accessories for "tricking" constituted their stock in trade, and in some instances yielded them no insignificant revenue. The field in which Voodooism flourished best was the far south among the rice, cotton, and sugar plantations, where the negroes were not brought into contact so closely with their masters as they were further north.

"Mr. Newell's case would be stronger if he could show that the Vaudois were accused, like the Voodoos, of serpent-worship."—London Daily News.

B. As adj.: Belonging to, connected with, or practicing a system of magic, human sacrifice, and cannibalism. [A. 1.]

voô'-doô-îsm, s. [VOODOO.] Belief in or practice of voodoo magic.

vô-râ'-ci-ous, adj. [Lat. vorax (genit. voracis)=greedy, voracious, from voro=to devour; Fr. & Ital. vorace; Sp. & Port. voraz.]

1. Greedy in eating; eating food in large quantities; ravenous, gluttonous.

"They are very voracious, and will dispatch a carcass in a trice."—Dampier: Voyages (an. 1676).

2. Marked by voracity or greediness.

"They are men of a voracious appetite, but no taste."—Addison: Spectator, No. 452.

3. Ready to swallow up or devour; as, a voracious gulf.

4. Rapacious.

vô-râ'-ci-ous-lŷ, adv. [Eng. voracious; -ly.] In a voracious manner; with greedy appetite; ravenously.

vô-râ'-ci-ous-nëss, s. [Eng. voracious; -ness.] The quality or state of being voracious; greediness of appetite; ravenousness, voracity.

"Distinguishing himself by a voraciousness of appetite."—Taiter, No. 255.

vô-râç'-i-tŷ, vo-rac-i-tie, s. [French voracité, from Latin voracitatem, accus. of voracitas, from vorax=voracious (q. v.).]

1. The quality or state of being voracious; ravenousness; voraciousness.

"What a nature is that which feedeth the most greedy voracity in the whole world."—P. Holland: Pliny, bk. ii., ch. cvii.

2. Rapacity, greed.

"Who then shall check his voracity, or calm his revenge?"—Ep. Taylor: Sermons, vol. ii., ser. 18.

vô-răg'-în-oŭs, a. [Lat. voraginosus, from vorago, genit. voraginis=a deep and almost bottomless abyss, from voro=to devour, to swallow up.] Of or pertaining to a gulf or whirlpool; hence, devouring, swallowing.

"A cavern's jaws, voraginous and vast."

Mallet: Amyntor and Theodora, i.

vô-râ'-gô, s. [Lat.] A gulf, an abyss.

"The famous Sicilian swimmer diving into the voragos and broken rocks by Charybdis."—Browne: Tract xiii., § 2.

vôr'-ant, a. [Lat. vorans, pr. par. of voro=to devour.]

Her.: Devouring (Applied to an animal depicted as devouring another.)

vô-rau'-lite (au as ôw), s. [After Vorau, Styria, where found, and Gr. lithos=a stone; Ger. vorau-lith.]

Min.: The same as LAZULITE (q. v.).

vor-hau'-gêr-ite (au as ôw), s. [After J. Vorhauser; suff. -ite (Min.).]

Min.: A resinous variety of the mineral Serpentine (q. v.), of a brown to greenish-black color. Hardness, 3.5; specific gravity, 2.45. Found in the Fleims Valley, Tyrol.

vor'-têx (pl. vor'-tŷ-cêş, vor'-têx-êş), s. [Lat. vortex, vertex, from verto=to turn.]

Physics: The form assumed when any portion of a fluid is set rotating on an axis; a whirling or circular motion of any fluid, either of water or air, forming a kind of cavity in the center of the circle, and in some instances drawing up the water or absorbing other things. Eddies, whirlpools, water-spouts, whirlwinds, &c., are familiar examples.

Astron. & Physics: An hypothesis proposed by René Descartes (A. D. 1596-1650) to account for the movements of the heavenly bodies. He supposed space filled with fluid matter, and that each fixed star or planet exerted some influence on the matter for a certain distance round itself; this space he called its "heaven." The sun's heaven was moved around it after the manner of a vortex or whirlpool, carrying with it the planets, around which their heavens moved as minor vortices. Newton controverted the Cartesian view, which long retarded the acceptance of the gravitation theory on the Continent.

Physics: A name sometimes given to the ultimate parts of matter which, on the Vortex-theory of Sir W. Thomson, may be inconceivably small vortices in the ether.

Physics: A vortical molecular filament or column returning into itself so as to form a ring composed of a number of small rotating circles placed side by side. All such rings have two motions; a motion of translation, and a vortical motion; but the vortical motion of the inner portions of the ring appears to coincide with the motion of translation, while that of the outer portions is in a contrary direction to it. Vortex-rings may be made in a glass of water by dropping milk or ink into it, but the rings are so small that the only motion perceptible is that which carries them to the bottom of the glass. The simplest method of showing vortex-rings in the air is to take an ordinary match-box and make a small round hole in one end; in the inner portion of the box put a little dry tobacco, light it, and close the box. By giving the end of the box opposite the hole a smart tap with the finger, tiny smoke-rings will issue from the orifice. It should be borne in mind that the smoke has nothing to do with the vortex, which is in the air—the smoke only renders it visible.

vortex-wheel, vortex water-wheel, s. A kind of turbine in which the water enters tangentially at the surface and is discharged at the center.

vor'-tŷ-cal, vor'-tŷ-call, a. [Lat. vortex (genit. vorticis)=a vortex (q. v.).] Pertaining to or resembling a vortex; whirling, revolving.

"It is not a magnetic power, nor the effect of a vortical motion."—Bentley: Sermons.

vor'-tŷ-cal-lŷ, adv. [Eng. vortical; -ly.] In a vortical manner; with a whirling or revolving motion.

vor-tŷ-çêl'-lâ, s. [Mod. Lat., dimin. from Latin vortex (q. v.).]

Zoöl.: Bell-animalcule; the type-genus of Vorticellina (q. v.), with numerous species from salt and fresh water. Attached posteriorly by a simple, undivided, contractile thread-like pedicle, inclosing an elastic muscular fibrilla, and assuming on contraction a much shortened and usually corkscrew-like contour. (See illustration under Bell-animalcule.) The adoral system consists of a spirally convolute, ciliary wreath, the right limb of which descends into the oral or vestibular fossa, the left obliquely elevated and encircling the rotatory or ciliary disc; oral fossa on ventral side, continued into a conspicuous pharynx.

vor-tŷ-çêl'-lŷd, vor-tŷ-çêl'-lŷ-dan, s. [VORTICELLIDÆ.] Any individual of the Vorticellidæ (q. v.). (Saville Kent: Infusoria, ii. 671.)

vor-tŷ-çêl'-lŷ-dæ, s. pl. [Mod. Lat. vorticell(a); Lat. fem. pl. adj. suff. -idæ.]

Zoöl.: A family of Peritrichous Infusoria, with three sub-families: Vorticellina, Vaginicolina, and Ophrydina. Animalcules sedentary or attached, from salt or fresh water, ovate, campanulate, or sub-cylindrical; oral aperture terminal, eccentric, associated with a spiral fringe of adoral cilia, the right limb of which descends into the oral aperture, the left limb encircling a more or less elevated, protrusible, and retractile ciliary disk. They increase by fission, by the conjugation of two dissimilar zoids, the one (male?) minute and migrant, the other (female?) normal and sedentary, and by the development out of the endoplast of minute free-swimming germs.

vor-tŷ-çêl'-lŷ-nâ, s. pl. [Mod. Lat. vorticell(a); Lat. neut. pl. adj. suff. -ina.]

Zoöl.: A sub-family of Vorticellidæ, with eleven genera. Animalcules naked, long, sessile.

vor'-tŷ-çêş, s. pl. [VORTEX.]

vor-tŷ'-ciâl (ci as sh), a. [VORTICAL.] Whirling, vortical (q. v.).

"Cyclic and seemingly gyrating or vortical movements."—Poe: Eureka (Works), 1864, ii. 205.

vor'-tŷ-côse, a. [Lat. vortex (genit. vorticis)=a vortex (q. v.).] Whirling, vortical, revolving.

vor-tŷg'-în-oŭs, adj. [VORTEX.] Having a motion revolving round an axis or center; vortical.

"Lifting high his angry tide Vortiginous." Couper: Homer's Iliad, xxi.

vôş'-gŷte, s. [After the Vosges, where found; suff. -ite (Min.).]

Min.: An altered labradorite found in a porphyritic rock. Specific gravity, 2.771; color, white to greenish or bluish; luster, greasy.

vô'-tar-êss, vôt'-rêss, s. [Eng. votary; -ess.] A female votary; a female devoted to any service, worship, or state of life.

"Thy votress from my tender years I am."

Dryden: Palamon and Arcite, iii. 225.

vô'-tar-îst, s. [Eng. votary; -ist.] A votary.

"A study which every votarist of the dramatic muses ought to pay attention and respect to."—Observer, No. 75.

vô'-tar-ŷ, vo-tar-ie, a. & s. [Latin vo(tum)=a vow; Eng. suff. -ary.]

A. As adj.: Consecrated by a vow or promise; consequent on a vow; devoted, votive.

"Votary resolution is made equipollent to custom."—Bacon: Essays; Of Custom.

B. As subst.: One who is devoted, consecrated, or promised under a vow; hence, more generally, one who is devoted, given, or addicted to some particular worship, service, study, or the like; a devotee.

"The Actes of English Votaries, comprehendynge their vchaste practices and examples by all ages."—Bale: English Votaries. (Pref.)

vôte, s. [Lat. vo(tum)=a vow, a wish, prop. neut. sing. of vo(tus), pa. par. of vo(veo)=to vow (q. v.); Fr. vote; Sp., Port., & Ital. voto.]

*1. An ardent wish; a prayer, a suffrage.

2. The expression of a decided wish, opinion, desire, will, preference, or choice in regard to any measure proposed or to any candidate put forward, in which the person voting has an interest with others, either in passing or rejecting a proposed law, rule, regulation, &c., or in electing or rejecting a proposed candidate for any particular office or post. Votes of this sort can be given in various ways, as by raising the hand, by word of mouth (vivâ voce), by ballot, by a ticket, &c.; suffrage.

"Bishops give not their votes by blood in parliament, but by an office annex to them, which being taken away they cease to vote, therefore there is not the same reason for them as for temporal lords."—Selden: Table Talk, p. 11.

3. Expression of will by a majority; result of voting; decision by some expression of the minds of a number.

4. That by means of which will, preference, or decision is given in elections or in deciding propositions, as a ballot, a ticket, &c.

5. That which is voted, given, granted, allowed, or conveyed by the will of a majority; a thing conferred or granted by vote; a grant.

"Then a vote of thanks was moved to the mayor for his able conduct in the chair."—Dickens: Pickwick, ch. xiii.

6. Votes collectively; votes given.

"Alluding to the large amount of the illiterate vote in Ireland."—London Daily Chronicle.

vôte, v. i. & t. [Fr. voter.] [VOTE, s.]

A. Intrans.: To give a vote; to express or signify the mind, will, or preference, as by ballot, a ticket, or other authorized means, in electing candidates to any office or post, or in passing or rejecting motions, laws, regulations, or the like, or in deciding upon any proposition, in which one has an interest with others.

B. Transitive:

1. To choose by suffrage; to elect by some expression of will.

2. To enact or establish by vote or by some expression of will.

"But the late long lasting parliament voted it a monopoly."—Fuller: Worthies; Yorkshire.

3. To grant, allow, or confer by vote or expression of will.

4. To declare; to set down; to characterize.

"It has come to be voted rather a vulgar thing to be married by banns at all."—London Daily Telegraph.

vôte-lëss, a. [Eng. vote, s.; -less.] Not having or not entitled to a vote.

"A small knot of the voteless have gathered."—London Daily Telegraph.

vôt-ër, s. [Eng. vote(e), v.; -er.] One who has or is legally entitled to vote or give his suffrage; an elector. [REGISTRATION, ¶ 4.]

voting-machine, s. A mechanical device for recording and counting votes cast at a general election. A number of machines of this character have been invented, and their use is recommended by ballot reform advocates. Also called vote-recorder.

voting-paper, s. A paper by means of which a voter gives his vote; a balloting paper. Such papers are used only where the number of persons nominated exceeds the number of vacancies; they contain a list of the candidates alphabetically arranged, and are filled up by the voter secretly by affixing a mark to the names of the candidates he votes for.

vôt-ist, s. [Eng. vote(e); -ist.] One who makes a vow; a vower.

"A poore woman, votist of revenge."

Chapman: Bussy D'Ambois, iii.

vô-tive, a. [Lat. votivus, from votum=a vow; Fr. votif; Sp. & Port. votivo.]

1. Given, paid, or consecrated in consequence or in fulfillment of a vow.

"So that the old man's life described, was seen As in a votive table in his lines."

Ben Jonson: Poetaster. (Dial.)

*2. Observed or practiced in consequence or in fulfillment of a vow.

"Votive abstinence some constitutions may endure."—Feltham: Resolves, i. 85.

votive-mass, s. [MASS (2), s., ¶ 16.]

votive-medal, subst. A medal struck in grateful commemoration of some auspicious event, as a victory, the recovery of a prince from illness, &c.

votive-offering, s. An ex-voto (q. v.).

vô-tive-ly, adv. [English votiv(e); -ly.] In a votive manner; by vow.

vô-tive-ness, subst. [Eng. votive; -ness.] The quality or state of being votive.

vôt-ô-graph, s. [Eng. vote, and Gr. grapho=to write.] A name given to a voting-machine invented by John W. Rhines, of St. Paul, Minn. It was the first mechanical vote-recorder invented.

vôt-rëss, s. [VOTARESS.]

vouçh, v. t. & i. [Norm. Fr. voucher=to vouch, cite, or call in a suit, from Lat. voco=to call, to call upon, to summon, from vox (genit. vocis)=the voice.]

A. Transitive:

I. Ordinary Language:

*1. To call to witness; to obtest; to call upon.

"Do allege the same histories and vouche (as I mought say) to theyr aide the autoritie of the writers."—Elyot: Governor, bk. iii., ch. xxiv.

*2. To warrant; to be surety for; to answer for; to guarantee.

"Vouched by the concurrent testimony of unsuspected witnesses."—Locke: Human Understand., bk. iv., ch. xvi.

3. To assert, to maintain, to affirm, to attest, to witness.

"What can you vouch against him?"

Shakesp.: Measure for Measure, v.

*4. To support; to back up; to follow up.

"Bold words vouched with a deed so bold."

Milton: P. L., v. 66.

II. Law: To call or summon into court to warrant and defend, or to make good a warranty of title.

"He vouches the tenant in tail, who vouches over the common vouchee."—Blackstone: Comment.

B. Intransitive:

vousoir (as vōs-swâr), s. [Fr., from voussure=the curvature of a vault, from a verb vousser (supposed Low Lat. volutio)=to make round, from Lat. volutus, pa. par. of volvo=to turn.]

Arch.: One of the stones which immediately form the arch of a bridge, vault, &c., and are always cut more or less in the shape of a truncated pyramid or wedge. The under sides of the voussoirs form the intrados or soffit of the arch, and the upper sides the extrados. The middle voussoir is called the keystone of the arch.

Arch of Waterloo Bridge.

a a. Voussoirs; b. Keystone; c c. Intrados or soffit.

[AVOUTERIE.] Adultery. (Wycliffe: Jeremiah, xvii. 27.)

vōw, vou, vowe, s. [O. Fr. vou, vo, veu (Fr. vœu)=a vow, from Lat. votum=a thing vowed, a vow; prop. neut. sing. of votus, pa. par. of voveo=to promise, to vow; Sp. & Ital. voto. Vote and vow are doublets. Avow is a compound from vow, by the prefixing of a=Lat. ad.] [AVOW.]

I. Ordinary Language:

1. A solemn promise; a kind of promissory oath made to God, or to some deity, to perform some act, or to dedicate to the deity something of value, on the fulfillment of certain conditions, or in the event the vower receives something specially desired, as recovery from illness, deliverance from danger, success in an enterprise, or the like.

"A vow, being a promise made solemnly to God, partakes of the nature of an oath."—Secker: Works, vol. vi., lect. 20.

2. A solemn promise to follow out some line of conduct, or to consecrate or devote one's self, wholly or in part, for a longer or shorter time, to some act or service.

3. A solemn promise or declaration of fidelity and constancy.

"It is the hour when lovers' vows Seem sweet in every whispered word."

Byron: Parisina, i.

*4. A solemn asseveration or declaration.

"To entertain my vows of thanks and praise."

Shakesp.: Henry VI., Pt. II., iv. 9.

II. Eccles. & Church History: A special promise made to God to do or forego something for the promotion of his glory. The subject-matter must always consist of "a greater good," in ecclesiastical language "de bono meliori." The practice of making vows appears in the religious history of all races in any degree civilized. It entered largely into the Mosaic Dispensation (Gen. xxviii. 20-22; Lev. xvii. 2; Num. xxx. 2, &c.) In Deut. xxiii. 21, the necessity of fulfilling a vow is insisted on (cf. Eccles. v. 4, 5), but in the following verse it is pointed out that there is no sin in forbearing to make a vow. The practice continued among the Jews in New Testament times (Acts xviii. 18). With the rise of monachism (q. v.), vows to observe the evangelical councils of voluntary poverty, perpetual chastity, and entire obedience became common and prevailed in the Church till the Reformation, when the Reformers taught that, since it was the duty of every man to devote himself and all his possessions to the service of God, vows were unnecessary. Vows, however, still enter largely into the religious system of the Roman Church. To the three vows (poverty, chastity, and obedience) taken by all religious [RELIGIOUS, B.], a fourth, that of stability (=remaining in the order) is sometimes added. In addition to these there are private vows—of chastity, pilgrimage, &c. Vows are of two kinds, simple and solemn, the difference between them being that the latter are instituted as such, and accepted as irrevocable by the Church, and they constitute one of the marks of a religious order as distinguished from a congregation [ORDER, s., ¶ (9)]. Simple and solemn vows differ also in their effects. A simple vow makes marriage unlawful, and deprives the person who has made it of a right to use any property he may possess; a solemn vow makes marriage invalid, and takes away all dominion over property. Solemn and certain simple vows, as those of chastity and of greater pilgrimage, can only be dispensed by the Pope, or by a superior specially delegated for the purpose; but most of the simple vows can be dispensed by the bishop of the diocese in which the person who has made the vow resides.

vow-breach, vow-break, s. The breaking of a vow or vows.

"Sacrilege and vow-break in Ananias and Sapphira made them descend quick into their graves."—Jeremy Taylor: Holy Dying.

vow-breaker, s. One who breaks his vow or vows.

"And this is that holy bishop Paphnutius, whome these evangelical vow-breakers pretende to be their proctour for their vnlaful mariages."—Jewell: Defence of Apologie, p. 162.

fâte, fât, färe, amidst, whât, fâll, father; wê, wêt, hère, camêl, hêr, thêre; pîne, pît, sîre, sîr, marîne; gô, pôt, or, wôre, wôlf, wôrk, whô, sôn; mûte, cûb, cûre, ûnite, cûr, râle, fûll; trÿ, Sÿrian. æ, œ = ē; ey = ā. qu = kw.

vow-fellow, s. One who is bound by the same vow.

"Vow-fellows with this virtuous king."

Shakesp.: Love's Labor's Lost, ii.

vōw, *vowe, *vow-en, v. t. & i. [O. Fr. voer (Fr. vouer).] [Vow, s.]

A. Transitive:

1. To promise solemnly; to give, consecrate, or dedicate by a vow or solemn promise, as to God or a deity.

"When thou vowest a vow defer not to pay it . . . pay that which thou hast vowed."—Eccles. v. 4.

2. To threaten or denounce solemnly or upon oath.

Shakesp.: Rape of Lucrece, 1, 179.

B. Intransitive:

1. To make a vow or solemn promise; to bind one's self by a vow.

"He that vows never to have an ill thought, never to commit an error, hath taken a course that his little infirmities shall become crimes."—Bp. Taylor: Sermons vol. i., ser. 14.

2. To asseverate or protest solemnly.

"We heard him swear and vow to God,
He came but to the duke of Lancaster."

Shakesp.: Henry IV., Pt. I., iv. 3.

vōwed, pa. par. & a. [Vow, v.]

A. As pa. par.: (See the verb.)

B. As adjective:

1. Devoted, consecrated, or dedicated by a vow.

"Never faith could hold, if not to beauty vowed."

Shakesp.: Passionate Pilgrim, 58.

*2. Confirmed by oath; sworn to.

"With a vowed contract."

Shakesp.: Measure for Measure, v.

3. Sworn, constant, inveterate, confirmed.

"[The] vowed foe of my felicitie."

Spenser: F. Q., I. xii. 19.

vōw'-ēl, *vow-ell, s. & a. [Fr. voyelle=a vowel, from Lat. vocale, accus. of vocalis=sounding, vocal (q. v.); Sp. vocal; Port. vogal; Ital. vocale.]

A. As substantive:

1. A sound that is uttered by simply opening the mouth or vocal organs; a sound produced by the vibration of the vocal chords. The pitch or tone of a vowel is determined by the vocal chords, but its quality depends upon the configuration of the mouth or buccal tube. A, i, and u are by philologists called the primitive vowels, and from them all the various vowel sounds in the Aryan languages have been developed. A vowel differs from a consonant in that the former can be pronounced by itself, while a consonant requires the aid of a vowel to be sounded with it. While there are only five vowels, i. e., characters representing such sounds, yet there are fourteen vowel and five diphthongal sounds in English.

"For the formation of the three principal vowels, we give the interior of the mouth two extreme positions. In one we round the lips and draw down the tongue so that the cavity of the mouth assumes the shape of a bottle without a neck, and we pronounce u. In the other we narrow the lips and draw up the tongue as high as possible, so that the buccal tube represents a bottle with a very wide neck, and we pronounce i (as in French and German). If the lips are wide open, and the tongue lies flat and in its natural position, we pronounce a. Between these three elementary articulations there is an indefinite variety of vowel sounds."—Morris: Hist. Outlines of English Accidence, § 47.

2. A letter or character representing such a sound.

B. As adj.: Pertaining to a vowel; vocal.

vowel-points, s. pl. [POINT, s., ¶ 16.]

vōw'-ēl-ish, adj. [English vowel; -ish.] Of the nature of a vowel.

"The power is always vowelish, even where it leads the vowel in any syllable."—Ben Jonson: English Grammar, ch. iii.

vōw'-ēl-ism, s. [Eng. vowel; -ism.] The use of vowels.

vōw'-ēled, adj. [Eng. vowel; -ed.] Furnished with or containing vowels.

"Pauses, cadence, and well vowel'd words."

Dryden: To the Earl of Roscommon.

vōw'-ēr, s. [Eng. vow, s.; -er.] One who makes a vow or vows.

"The gyfte . . . not promysed to that kynde of vowers."—Bale: Apologie. (Pref.)

vōw'-ēss, *vow-esse, s. [Eng. vow; -ess.] A woman who has taken a vow; a nun.

"In that church also lieth this ladie, buried . . . in the habit of a vowess."—Holinshed: Description of England, bk. ii., ch. iiii.

vōw'-lèss, *vōw-lesse, a. [Eng. vow, s.; -less.] Free from or not bound by a vow or vows.

"He hath done with their owne vowes, and now descends to us; whom he confesses vowlesse."—Bp. Hall: Honor of the Married Clergie, § 17.

vox-humana, s. [Lat.]

Music: A reed stop in the organ intended to imitate the sounds of the human voice, consisting of a large reed and short tube; called voce humana in Italian, voix humaine in French, and also anthropoglossa.

vōy'-age (age as ĭg), *ve-age, *vi-age, *vy-age, s. [O. Fr. veiage (Fr. voyage), from Lat. viaticum=provisions or requisites for a journey; from viaticus=pertaining to a journey, from via=a way, a journey; Ital. viaggio; Sp. viage; Prov. viatge.] [WAY.]

*1. A journey, whether by land or by sea.

"To Scotland now he fondes, to redy his viage."

Robert de Brunne, p. 314.

2. A journey or passing by sea or water from one place or country to another, especially a journey by water to a place far distant.

*3. The practice or habit of traveling, especially from one country to another.

"All nations have interknowledge of one another, by voyage into foreign parts, or strangers that come to them."—Bacon.

*4. Any course or way taken; an attempt.

"If he should intend this voyage toward my wife."—Shakesp.: Merry Wives, ii. 1.

¶ One of the most remarkable voyages of antiquity was that of Solomon and Hiram's navigators to India, or some place to which its productions were brought. The names of the apes, peacocks, &c., obtained are Malabar words, which suggests that Southwestern India itself was visited. An exploring expedition sent out by Pharaoh Necho about 604 B. C. is said to have sailed round Africa. The Periplus of Hanno the Carthaginian, B. C. 400, was also a great nautical exploit. The discovery of America by Columbus, 1492, and the passage of the Cape of Good Hope by Vasco de Gama, with his ultimate arrival in India (A. D. 1497), constitute two of the greatest nautical enterprises of modern times. After these rank the expeditions which circumnavigated the globe [CIRCUMNAVIGATOR] and those for the discovery of the Northeast and Northwest passages. [NORTHEAST, ¶; NORTHWEST, ¶.]

vōy'-age (age as ĭg), v. i. & t. [Fr. voyager.] [VOYAGE, s.]

A. Intrans.: To travel; to make a journey or voyage; to travel by water.

"Life hath not been unexpensive in learning, and voyaging about."—Milton: Apol. for Smectymnus, § 8.

B. Trans.: To travel or pass over; to traverse.

"I with pain

Voyog'd th' unreal, vast unbounded deep."

Milton: P. L., x. 471.

vōy'-age-a-ble (age as ĭg), adj. [Eng. voyage; -able.] Capable of being traveled or sailed over; navigable.

vōy'-ag-ēr (ag as ĭg), s. [Eng. voyag(e); -er.] One who travels or passes by water from one place or country to another.

"Long shall the voyager, with th' Ionian blast, Hail the bright clime of battle and of song," vōy'-a-geūr (g as zh), s. [Fr.] A traveler; specifically applied in Canada to a class of men employed by the fur companies in transporting goods by the rivers and across the land to and from the remote stations of the northwest. They are nearly all French Canadians or half-breeds.

Byron: Childe Harold, ii. 91.

vōy'-al, vōy'-ōl, s. [VIOL (2), s.]

vōy'-ra, s. [The Guianan name of one species.]

Bot.: A parasitic genus of Gentianæ, akin to the Orobanchaceæ. They grow on the trunks of old trees. The tuberous roots of V. rosea are eaten in Guiana like potatoes.

V-pūg, s. [See def.]

Entom.: Eupithecia coronata, a pug-moth (q. v.). The fore wings are green with numerous black and pale markings, the most conspicuous of which is a V-shaped black mark, whence the name. The caterpillar feeds on the traveler's joy, the agrimony, the golden rod, and the wild angelica.

vraisemblance (as vrā-šāñ-blāñs'), s. [Fr.] An appearance of truth.

vrēck'-ite, s. [After Ben Bhreck, or Vreck, near Tongue, Sutherland, where found; suffix -ite (Min.).]

Min.: A soft, granular mineral occurring as a coating on crystals of quartz. Color, light apple-green. An analysis yielded: Silica, 74.92; alumina, 7.16; sesquioxide of iron, 12.71; protoxide of iron, 2.11; protoxide of manganese, 0.41; lime, 16.08; magnesia, 8.26; water, 17.77=99.42.

vūgg, vugh, s. [Etym. doubtful.]

Min.: A cavity; a hollow in a rock, or in a lode; a vogle.

Vūl'-cān, s. [Lat. Vulcanus.]

1. Rom. Antiq.: The god who presided over the working of metals. He was the son of Jupiter, who, incensed at his interference on the part of his mother, Juno, cast him out of heaven; he fell in the isle of Lemnos, and broke his leg in the fall. He was the patron of armorers and workers in metal. There is about the character of Vulcan much of the usual confusion belonging to Greek mythology. Cicero mentions three Vulcans, besides the son of Jupiter; one, the child of Uranus; another, of Nilus, who reigned in Egypt; a third of Mænalius. A peculiarity attending the worship of Vulcan was that the victims were wholly consumed, in reference to his character as god of fire. In sculpture he is represented as bearded, with a hammer and pincers, and a pointed cap. He had under him as workmen, the Cyclopes, whose workshop was on Mount Etna, where thunderbolts were forged. He is identified with the Greek Hephestos.

*2. Astron.: The name given to a planet, imaginary or real, between the Sun and Mercury. On March 26, 1859, M. Lescarbault, a village physician of Orgères, Eure-et-Loire, France, saw, or fancied that he saw, a small dark planet-like body pass across the sun's disc. In September the alleged discovery reached Leverrier, who eagerly grasped it, as he had previously come to the conclusion that the motions of Mercury were affected by the perturbation of a planet between it and the sun. He even went so far as hypothetically to calculate the elements of the new planet. M. Liass stated that he was examining the sun at the very moment of M. Lescarbault's supposed discovery, and was certain that no dark body passed across the disc. The planet was called by anticipation Vulcan, but its existence still remains unconfirmed. (Dunkin: Midnight Sky.)

Vūl-cā'-nī-ān, a. [Lat. Vulcanius, from Vulcanus=Vulcan.]

I. Ordinary Language:

1. Pertaining to Vulcan; formed by Vulcan.

"The Vulcanian panoply which Achilles lent to his feeble friend."—Macaulay: Hist. Eng., ch. vii.

2. Volcanic; vulcanian.

vūl-cān-ic-i-tỹ, s. [Eng. vulcanic; -ity.] The quality or state of being volcanic or volcanic; volcanic power or action; volcanicity.

vūl'-cān-ism, s. [Eng. Vulcan; -ism.]

Geol.: A collective term for the phenomena due to internal fire or heat, as volcanoes, hot springs, &c.

"A grander phase of vulcanism than that now displayed either by Vesuvius or Hecla."—Chambers' Journal, Feb. 27, 1886.

vūl'-cān-ist, s. [Lat. Vulcanus = (1) the god of fire; (2) fire.]

Geol.: One who attributed to igneous agency the formation of various rocks, notably basalt, &c., supposed by the Neptunists, led by Werner (1750-1817), to have been deposited from a chaotic aqueous fluid. The controversy became vehement, and the two parties degenerated into warring factions, the Vulcanist hypothesis ultimately holding the field. Called also Plutonists. [GEOLOGY, I.; HUTTONIAN-THEORY, WERNERIAN.]

"The bitter controversies of the Neptunists and Vulcanists."—Brown: Our Earth and its Story, i. 99.

vūl'-cān-ite, s. [Eng. vulcan; -ite.]

1. Ord. Lang.: A hard and non-elastic variety of vulcanized rubber, used for making combs, dental plates, and numerous other objects. It contains from 30 to 60 per cent. more sulphur, and is subjected to a higher and more prolonged heat in curing than ordinary vulcanized rubber. It is of a brownish-black color, is hard and tough, cuts easily, is susceptible of a good polish, and is not affected by water or any of the other caoutchouc solvents. It evolves a considerable amount of electricity when rubbed, and is hence much used in the construction of electric machines.

2. Petrol.: A name sometimes given to Pyroxene (q. v.).

vūl-cān-ī-zā'-tion, subst. [Eng. vulcaniz(e); -ation.] The act or process of vulcanizing, or of treating caoutchouc or india-rubber with some form of sulphur, to effect certain changes in its properties, as to render it insensible to atmospheric changes, increase its durability, and adapt it for various purposes in the arts. This was originally effected by dipping the rubber in melted sulphur, and heating it to nearly 300°. Several other methods have been employed. The substance thus formed is elastic at all temperatures, cannot be dissolved by the ordinary solvents, and resists the effects of heat within a considerable range of temperature. Vulcanized india-rubber is largely used for many useful purposes, as for waterproofing cloth, for boots, shoes, mats, toys, belting, buffers, wheel-tires, washers, valves, pipes, fire-hose, medical and surgical appliances, &c. [VULCANITE.]

vũl'-càn-ize, v. t. [Eng. vulcan; -ize.] To treat by the process of vulcanization, as india-rubber.

vũl'-càn-ized, pa. par. & a. [VULCANIZE.]

vulcanized india-rubber, s. India-rubber subjected to the process of vulcanization (q. v.).

vũl'-càn-iz-ēr, s. [Eng. vulcaniz(e); -er.] One who or that which vulcanizes; specifically, the apparatus used in vulcanizing india-rubber.

vũl'-càn-ōl'-ō-ğist, subst. [Eng. vulcanolog(y); -ist.] One who studies or is versed in vulcanology; a volcanist.

vũl'-càn-ōl'-ō-ğy, s. [English vulcano=a volcano; suff. -ology.]

Physics: That department of natural science which concerns itself with igneous phenomena, as volcanoes, hot springs, &c.

"Under Vulcanology he treats of the volcanic eruptions during the two years."—Nature, Oct. 22, 1885, p. 609.

vũl'-gar, a. & s. [Fr. vulgaire=vulgar, common, from Lat. vulgaris, from vulgus=the common people, lit.=a crowd or throng; from same root as Sansc. varga=a troop; vraja=a flock, a herd, a multitude; Eng. urge.]

Vũl'-gāte, s. [Lat. vulgatus=general, common, pa. par. of vulgo=to make common, general, or universal; vulgus=a crowd, the public.]

Biblical Versions: The most celebrated and most widely diffused version of the Bible into the Latin language. It is believed to have been made by St. Jerome, who was born in Dalmatia A. D. 329, and died at Bethlehem A. D. 420. The early Church seems for a considerable time to have consisted mainly of members who spoke Greek, and the necessity for a Latin version of the Scriptures was first felt in Northern Africa. One or more Latin translations were made in that quarter, which after a time were superseded by the Italic Version (q. v.). In 383 Pope Damasus urged Jerome to revise the Latin version of the New Testament by the Greek original. Undertaking the work, he found innumerable false readings, interpolations, and corruptions, and though he acted cautiously to avoid alarming the ignorant and the timid, his version was a great advance on its predecessors. He next revised the Latin version of the Old Testament by the aid of the Greek Septuagint. Finally acquiring the Hebrew tongue after he was forty-five years of age, he translated the Old Testament directly from the original language. Although his version had at first to encounter the hostile clamors of the ignorant, it made way by its own merits, without much assistance from authority, through the whole Latin-speaking portion of ancient Christendom. Gradually, however, the text was corrupted, and recensions became needful. One was commenced A. D. about 802 by Alcuin at the instance of Charlemagne, a second by Lanfranc, Archbishop of Canterbury, A. D. about 1089, and there were others. The invention of printing led to the immediate issue about 1455 of the Mazarin Vulgate, printed at Mainz by Gutenberg and Fust, others following at intervals. In 1546 a commission appointed by the Council of Trent reported that the text of the Vulgate was very corrupt. In 1587 an edition of the Vulgate appeared, the proof-sheets of which were partly corrected by Pope Sixtus V., who used his authority to procure acceptance for the work. But further study showed that many of the attempted emendations were erroneous, and there was a further revision by Toletus under the auspices of Pope Clement VIII. It was issued in 1592, and is the authorized edition in the Roman Church. It bears the name of both pontiffs, being entitled "Biblia Sacra Latina Vulgatæ editionis Sixti V. et Clementis VIII." Wycliffe's version of the Bible was made from the Vulgate; and thus that version has affected the Authorized version, as it has those published in the languages of Western Europe. A large number of the theological terms now in use, such as "sacrament," "justification," &c., have been adopted from the Latin of the Vulgate.

"The Latin Church found in the Vulgate an instrument for reaching all hearts and guiding all tongues."—J. S. Brewer: English Studies, p. 345.

¶ Hence, sometimes applied to the ordinary text of any author.

"Let us pass from 'The Tempest' to the 'Comedy of Errors,' v. ii., 'My heavy burden are delivered.' So the folio, and rightly. The vulgate gives 'burdens,' reduplicating the plural."—Notes and Queries, May 19, 1888, p. 382.

Zoöl.: A genus of Canidæ, from the Eocene of North America.

vŭl'-pēc'-u-lā, s. [Lat.=a little fox, dimin. from vulpes (q. v.).] (See etym. and compound.)

vulpecula-et-anser, s.

Astron.: The Fox and the Goose; a modern constellation between Aquila and Cygnus introduced in the sixteenth century by Hevelius. Bode registers within its limits 127 small stars.

vŭl'-pēc'-u-lār, adj. [Lat. vulpecula, dimin. from vulpes=a fox.] Of or pertaining to a fox; vulpine.

†vŭl'-pēs, s. [Lat.=a fox.]

Zoöl.: An old genus of Canidæ, having for its type Canis vulpes († Vulpes vulgaris), the Common Fox. It is now generally made a sub-genus of Canis (q. v.). The species or varieties are numerous and widely distributed over North America, the South of India, and Africa. They have the tail clothed with soft fur and long hair uniformly mixed. [VULPAVUS, VULPINE-SERIES.]

vŭl'-pīc, adj. [Mod. Lat. (Cetraria vulpina); suff. -ic.] Contained in or derived from Cetraria vulpina.

vulpic-acid, s.

Chem.: $C_{19}H_{14}O_5$. Vulpic acid. An acid occurring in the lichen Cetraria vulpina. The lichen is macerated with warm water, in presence of milk of lime, the extract treated with hydrochloric acid, and the flocculent precipitate of vulpic acid purified by recrystallization from boiling alcohol or ether. It separates from ether in transparent yellow needles, is nearly insoluble in water and absolute alcohol, more easily soluble in ether, and melts at 100°. Its salts are of no importance.

vŭl'-pī-çide, vŭl'-pē-çide, s. [Latin vulpes=a fox, and cædo (in comp. -cido)=to kill.]

1. The act or practice of killing a fox otherwise than by hunting. Such an act is considered by fox-hunters as extremely unsportsmanlike and disgraceful.

"The word vulpicide has been created to denounce a most hated crime."—Fortnightly Review, Dec., 1869, p. 623.

2. One who kills a fox otherwise than by hunting it.

"Their father bore (let us hope falsely) the awful repute of being a vulpicide."—Pall Mall Gazette.

vŭl'-pīne, a. [Latin vulpinus, from vulpes=a fox.]

1. Of, pertaining to, or characteristic of a fox; resembling a fox.

"A singular instance of vulpine sagacity and daring was witnessed."—Field, Oct. 3, 1885.

2. Crafty, cunning.

vulpine-opossum, s. [VULPINE-PHALANGER.]

vulpine-phalanger, s.

Zoöl.: Phalangista vulpeculus, an Australian Marsupial, resembling a fox in appearance, being two feet long exclusive of the tail, which is some fifteen inches more. Upper parts covered with dark gray fur, lighter beneath. Called also Vulpine and Brush-tailed Opossum.

vulpine-series, s.

Zoöl.: One of the two sections into which Huxley divides the genus Canis. It includes Vulpes (with Urocyon (q. v.), and Leucocyon (Gray)=C. lagopus, the Arctic Fox) and Fennecus. Called also the Alopecoid series.

vŭl'-pīn-īsm, s. [Eng. vulpin(e); -ism.] The quality of being vulpine; craft, artfulness, cunning. (Carlyle.)

vŭl'-pīn-īte, subst. [After Vulpino, Lombardy, where found; suff. -ite (Min.).]

vŭl'-pū-līc, a. [VULPIC.]

vŭl'-pū-līn, s. [Eng. vulpul(ic); -in.] [VULPIC-ACID.]

vŭl'-tūr, s. [Lat.=a vulture (q. v.).]

Ornith.: Vulture (q. v.); the type-genus of Vulturinæ, with one species, Vultur monachus, ranging over Spain and North Africa, through Nepal to China, north of Ningpo. Bill moderate, thick, higher than broad, hooked; nostrils in cere, naked, vertical; wings long; tail moderate, rounded; tarsi strong, reticulated, with small scales.

vŭl'-tūre, s. [Lat. vultur=a vulture, lit.=a plucker or tearer, from the same root as vellō (pa. t. vulsi)=to pluck, to tear.]

1. Lit. & Ornith.: A popular name for any species of the Vulturidæ (q. v.). They are large birds of repulsive habits and appearance, but extremely useful, since they perform the office of scavengers in the warm countries which they inhabit. They feed on the ground, where they walk with comparative ease, their large feet being well fitted for progression. Unlike eagles, they do not carry food to their young, but devour the carrion and feed their nestlings by regurgitating food from their crop. It has long been a vexed question as to whether they discover their prey by sight or by smell, and experiments show that they possess both senses in an extraordinary degree, but the balance of evidence goes to prove that they generally find their food by sight. The chief species are: The Black Vulture (Vultur monachus), the Griffon or Fulvous Vulture (Gyps fulvus), the Sociable or Eared Vulture (Otogyps auricularis), the Nubian Vulture (O. nubicus), the Egyptian Vulture (Neophron percnopterus), and the King Vulture (Sarcophagus papia). Gypætus barbatus, the Bearded Vulture, does not belong to the modern family.

2. Fig.: A person of a rapacious disposition.

"Ye dregs of baseness, vultures amongst men,
That tyre upon the hearts of generous spirits."
Beaum. & Flot.: Honest Man's Fortune, ii.

3. Scripture:

(1) Heb. dayyah, daah. Probably not a real vulture, but a species of Kite, perhaps Milvus ater. (Lev. xi. 14; Deut. xiv. 13; Isa. xxxiv. 15.)

(2) Ayyah. Probably Milvus regalis. (Job xxviii. 7.)

vŭl'-tūr-i-dæ, s. pl. [Mod. Lat. vultur; Latin fem. pl. adj. suff. -idæ.]

Ornith.: Vultures; a family of Accipitres, with two sub-families, Vulturinæ and Sarcophaginæ (both which see). Bill moderate, culmen straight at base, constricted in front of cere, curved toward the tip; upper mandible with margin sinuate; nostrils with a bony septum; tarsi reticulate, sometimes hirsute or semi-hirsute; middle toe the longest, outer toes conjoined at base by a membrane; claws slightly curved, obtuse. In most of the species the head and upper part of the neck are naked or beset with scattered plumules; eyes surrounded by the flattened face, not placed in a depression under erect plumes.

vŭl'-tūr-rī-næ, s. pl. [Mod. Latin vultur; Latin fem. pl. adj. suff. -inæ.]

Ornith.: Old World Vultures; the typical sub-family of Vulturidæ (q. v.), with the characters of the family. There are six genera, with sixteen species, entirely confined to the Old World.

vŭl'-tūr-īne, a. [Lat. vulturinus, from vultur=a vulture (q. v.).] Belonging or pertaining to the vulture; having the qualities of or resembling a vulture.

"No rustic who saw the fowl could have failed to notice its vulturine head and bare neck."—London Daily Telegraph.

vulturine sea-eagle, s.

Ornith.: Gypohierax angolensis, from the west coast of Africa. Called also the Angola Vulture, from its habitat.

vŭl'-tūr-īsh, a. [Eng. vultur(e); -ish.] Like a vulture; rapacious.

"Of temper most accipitral, hawkish, aquiline, not to say vulturish."—Carlyle: Miscel., iv. 245.

vŭl'-tūr-īsm, s. [Eng. vultur(e); -ism.] The attitude, nature, or character of a vulture; rapacity.

"Their owlisms, vulturisms, to an incredible extent, will disappear by and by."—Carlyle: Past and Present, bk. ii., ch. xvii.

vŭl'-tūr-ōus, a. [Eng. vultur(e); -ous.] Like a vulture; vulturish, rapacious.

"A vulturous nature which easily smeeth out, and hastily flyeth toward, and greedily feedeth on carrion."—Barrow: Sermons, vol. ii., ser. xx.

vŭl'-vā, s. [Lat.]

1. Anat.: The fissure in the external parts of generation in the female, extending from the mons veneris to the anus.

2. Zoölogy: A long and considerable depression, often occurring behind the summit of bivalve shells, at the dorsal part of the external surface.

vŭl'-vār, a. [Lat. vulv(a); Eng. suff. -ar.]

Med.: Of or belonging to the vulva.

vŭl'-vī-form, a. [Lat. vulva (q. v.), and forma=form.]

Bot.: Like a cleft with projecting edges, as the pappus of the genus Melampodium.

Griffon Vulture.

vŭl'-vī-tīs, s. [Lat. vulv(a); suff. -itis.]

Pathol.: Inflammation of the vulva. It may be simple, follicular, or gangrenous.

vŭl'-vō, prefix. [Latin vulva (q. v.).] Of or belonging to the vulva.

vulvo-uterine, a.

Anat.: Of or belonging to the uterus and the vulva, as the vulvo-uterine canal=the vagina.

vulvo-vaginal, a.

Med.: Of or belonging to the vagina and the vulva, as the vulvo-vaginal glands.

vŷ'-īng, pr. par. & a. [VIE.]

vŷ'-īng-lŷ, adv. [Eng. vying; -ly.] In a vying manner; emulously.

THE twenty-third letter of the English alphabet. It takes its form and its name from the union of two V's, the character V having formerly the name and force of U. [U, V.] The name "double u" is not, however, a very suitable one, being given to the letter from its form or composition, and not from its sound. In the Anglo-Saxon alphabet W had a distinctive character of its own, the modern letter being adopted in the thirteenth century. W represents two sounds: (1) The distinctive sound properly belonging to it, being that which it has at the beginning of a syllable, and when followed by a vowel, as in was, will, woe, forward, housework, &c.; (2) at the end of syllables, in which position it is always preceded by a vowel, it has either no force at all (or at most only serves to lengthen the vowel), as in law, paw, grow, lawful, &c., or it forms the second element in a diphthong, as in few, new, now, vow, &c., being in such cases really a vowel, and equivalent to the u in bough, neutral, &c. It is formed by opening the mouth with a close, circular configuration of the lips, the organs having exactly the same position as they have in pronouncing the oo in foot. W is hence often spoken of as a vowel; but it is not so, as may be seen by comparing woo, wood, and woman, in which w is not equivalent to oo. W is now silent in many words and positions: (1) In words, as in gunwale, boatswain, answer, sword, two, twopence, &c.; (2) when initial and followed by r, as in wrap, write, wrong, &c. (It is, however, still sounded in this position in Scotland.) The initial wh, in Anglo-Saxon, hw, as in who (A. S. hwa), whelp (A. S. hwelp), had originally a guttural sound, as seen in the Scotch quhat=what, quhan=when, &c. It represents the cognate Icelandic hv, and Latin initial qu. In English pronunciation, in initial wh, the w is silent in who, whom; in other words it is generally pronounced with a slight aspiration after it, as in when, what, which, though there is often a tendency to suppress the h and pronounce w pure and simple. The Anglo-Saxon initial sound wl has become simple l, as in lisp; A. S. wlisp. W has disappeared from some words, as from ooze=A. S. wōs; four=A. S. feower; tree=A. S. treow; knee=A. S. kneow. It has crept into whole and its derivatives=A. S. hal, hol; so whoop=Fr. houper. It has disappeared from the combinations, tw, thw, and sw, as tush=A. S. twisc; thong=A. S. thwang; sister=A. S. swister, swuster; such=A. S. swilc. It represents v in periwinkle=Fr. pervenche, Latin pervinca; and g in law=A. S. lagu; saw=A. S. sage; dawn=A. S. dagian; marrow=A. S. mearg, &c.; so wafer=O. Fr. gauffre, goffre, Lat. gafrum. Coming before an a, the w often gives the vowel an o sound, as in wad, wallow, &c.

W. As an initial, is used for West, as in charts: W. S. W.=West-South-West, &c.

W. As a symbol, is used:

In chem.: For the element Tungsten (Wolfram).

wa', s. [See def.] A wall (q. v.). (Scotch.)

"Stately stepped he east the wa'."

wāg'-ēr, wa-jour, s. [O. Fr. wageure, gageure, from Low Lat. wadiatura, from wadius, pa. par. of wadio=to wage (q. v.).]

I. Ordinary Language:

1. Something deposited, staked, or hazarded on the event of a contest or some unsettled question; something staked by each of two persons in support of his own opinion concerning a future or an unknown event; a stake. The party whose opinion proves to be correct receives what has been staked by both. By statutes of the United States, all contracts or agreements, whether in writing or parole, depending on wagers, are null and void, and the wager or money due thereon cannot be recovered in a court of law. A wager lost is, therefore, only a debt of honor.

"For most men (till by losing rendered sager)

Will back their own opinions with a wager."

Byron: Beppo, xxvii.

2. An occasion upon which two persons make a bet; a bet.

3. That on which bets are laid; the subject of a bet.

II. Eng. Law: An offer to make oath of innocence, or of non-indebtedness; or the act of making oath, together with the oaths of eleven compurgators, to fortify the defendant's oath.

wager-policy, s. [POLICY (2), s., ¶.]

Wordsworth: The Brothers.

B. Intrans.: To make a wager or wagers; to bet.

"I durst to wager she is honest."

Shakesp.: Othello, iv. 2.

wāg'-ēr-ēr, s. [Eng. wager, v.; -er.] One who wagers or bets.

"It will be very obliging if you please to take notice of wagerers."—Addison: Spectator, No. 145.

wāg'-ēr-īng, pr. par. or a. [WAGER, v.]

wagering-policy, s. [POLICY (2), s., ¶.]

wāg'-ēs, subst. pl. [WAGE, s.] The payment for work done or services performed; the price paid for labor; the return made or compensation paid bōil, bōy; pōut, jōwl; cat, çell, chorus, çhin, bench; go, gem; thin, ðhis; sin, aș; expect, Xenophon, exist. ph = f.

-cian, -tian = șan. -tion, -sion = șhũn; -țion, -șion = zhũn. -tious, -cious, -sious = șhũs. -ble, -dle, &c. = beł, deł.

to those employed to perform any kind of labor or service by their employers; hire, pay, recompense, meed. The rate of wages is determined by the ratio which the capital, for the productive use of which labor is sought, bears to the number of laborers seeking that kind of employment. When the capital increases more rapidly than the laboring population of a country, wages rise; when it increases more slowly, they fall. But in the United States, and most countries, the rise of wages produces an increase in the number of marriages and, in due time, of population, with the result of ultimately causing wages again to fall. All attempts to fix wages by law are inoperative and mischievous. The effort was made, in England, in the reign of Edward III. (1350), on the part of capitalists, after the Black Death, in 1346, had swept away so large a part of the population, both in Britain and the continent, that wages naturally and greatly rose. [LABORER, ¶.] If, on the other hand, the capitalist were required by law to give higher wages than the natural law of supply and demand fixed, his motive for continuing to carry on his business would become less potent, or might wholly cease, and ultimate injury be done to those whom it was sought to benefit. [TRUCK.]

"The produce of labor constitutes the natural recompense or wages of labor."—Smith: Wealth of Nations, bk. I., ch. viii.

¶ Although a plural, wages sometimes has the verb in the singular.

"The wages of sin is death."—Romans vi. 23.

¶ Wages in ordinary language is restricted to the payment for mechanical or muscular labor, and especially to that which is ordinarily paid for at short, stated intervals, as daily, weekly, fortnightly, &c., to workmen. Strictly speaking, however, the term wages comprehends as well the pay of officers, the fees of barristers, medical men, &c., the salary of clerks, the stipends of clergymen, as the remuneration for mechanical labor.

wages-fund, s.

Polit. Econ.: (See extract.)

"A fund theoretically assumed to exist, and out of which wages are paid. Practically, also, such a fund is known to exist, from the fact that wages are actually paid out of it. It is made up of two principal items. (1) A portion of the produce of past labor; and (2) credit based on the anticipation of the profits of future labor. But the absolute amount of the wages-fund is never accurately known, and it is probably never the same for two days together."—Bithell: Counting-house Dictionary.

wages-less*, a. Not receiving wages; unpaid. (Lytton: Pelham, ch. xlix.)

waget*, a. or s. [Prob. the same as WATCHET (q. v.).] Light-blue, or cloth of a light-blue color. (Chaucer.)

wäg'-ôn, wäg'-gôn, s. [Dut. wagen, cogn. with A. S. wægh=a wain (q. v.); Icel. & Sw. vagn; O. H. Ger. wagan.]

I. Ordinary Language:

1. A four-wheeled vehicle for the transport of goods, freight, and produce. The ordinary wagon is a strong, heavy vehicle, drawn by two (or sometimes more) horses yoked abreast. The fore-wheels are smaller than the hind-wheels, and their axle is swiveled to the body of the vehicle, so as to facilitate turning. Most wagons are supplied with strong springs, on account of the weight of the vehicle, and to make up for the absence of the steady power of the horses, who expend their force in pulling only, the weight being distributed over the four wheels. A vehicle on four wheels of equal diameter is of lighter draught than one in which the fore-wheels are smaller than the hind-wheels, unless the load is distributed on the wheels in proportion to their diameter. Common examples of the wagon are the brewer's dray, the agricultural wain, and the railway truck. Carriers' wagons are generally provided with wooden bows, over which can be stretched a covering of heavy canvas or other material, so as to protect the goods carried from rain, &c. The ends of the bows are inserted in staples on each side of the vehicle, so that cover and bows can be removed when not required.

Wa-ha'-bî, Wa-ha'-beê, s. [Named after Abdul-Wahhab = the servant of Him who gives everything.]

Mohammedanism (pl.): A sect founded by Abdul Wahhab, born toward the end of the seventeenth century, near Der'aiyeh, the capital of Nejd, in Arabia. During the Saracen period the Mohammedan sacred places were in Arab custody. When the Saracen was succeeded by the Turkish power they passed over into Turkish keeping. It is obligatory on every Mussulman who can afford the expense, to make a pilgrimage to Mecca at least once in his life. The Arabs were greatly scandalized by the moral laxity of some of the pilgrims, and it became painfully apparent that even the best of them had largely departed from the purity of the faith, according to divine honors to Mohammed, elevating tradition to the same level as revealed scripture, and quietly ignoring any precept of the Koran which required self-denial for its performance. Abdul Wahhab felt it a duty to make a determined effort to restore Mohammedanism to its pristine purity, and the most earnest Moslems gradually became his followers. Converting to his views Mohammed Ibn Saud, the powerful Sheikh of Der'aiyeh, whose daughter he married, he induced his father-in-law to draw the sword for the establishment of a pure Mohammedan theocracy. The Bedouins flocked to his standard; the towns of Arabia, less inclined to adopt the new faith, had to be conquered. The Pasha of Bagdad, A. D. 1748 and 1749, somewhat retarded, but did not permanently arrest their progress. In A. D. 1765 (1172 of the Hegira) the father-in-law died, and on June 14, 1787 (A. H. 1206), the revivalist or reformer. The former was succeeded by his son, Abdul-Aziz. In 1797 the Wahabees pillaged the town and tomb of Husein; in 1803 they captured Mecca, and in 1804 Medina, where they plundered the tomb of Mohammed himself. By this time Abdul-Aziz had been succeeded by his son Saud, by whose orders the Khoobba (public prayer) was no longer allowed to be offered in the name of the Sultan. With the exception of the territory subject to the Imam of Muscat, all Arabia now submitted to the Wahabees. They also captured some Arabic towns on the coast of Persia, and Wahabee pirates infested the Persian Gulf. In 1809 these pirates were severely punished by the British, in conjunction with the Imam of Muscat. The same year Mehemet Ali, Pasha of Egypt, prepared to attack them. In 1812 he took Medina, and in 1813 Mecca. In 1816 Ibrahim Pasha, the son of Mehemet Ali, assumed the command of the Egyptian troops, and, entering Arabia, took Der'aiyeh in 1818, and capturing Abdullah, son and successor of Saud, sent him to Constantinople, where he was beheaded. In 1827, 1834, 1838, and 1839 the Wahabees attempted to excite insurrections, and required continual vigilance from Egypt. In 1862 and 1863 Palgrave found them numerous in Arabia. The Wahabee movement is not now confined to Arabia; it has spread throughout the Mohammedan world, and though quiescent at present, still possesses vigorous life, and will doubtless again from time to time break forth. Many adherents of the sect are believed to exist in India, Patna being considered one of their strongholds.

*2. The state of forbearing sleep, especially for a solemn or religious or festive purpose; a vigil; specif., the feast of the dedication of a parish church, kept by watching all night. Each church on its consecration was dedicated to some particular saint, and when the anniversary of the day of consecration came round, the parish wake was held; and in many parishes a second wake was held on the birthday of the saint. Tents were erected in the churchyard to supply refreshments to the crowd on the morrow, which was kept as a public holiday. The original motive of devotion and reverence was soon lost at these meetings, which degenerated into mere fairs or markets, characterized by merry-making, and often disgraced by riot and dissipation; hence the term came to mean merry-making generally; a festive gathering.

"Some pretty fellow,
With a clean strength that cracks a cudgell well,
And dances at a wake, and plays at nine-holes."
Beaum. & Flet.: Captain, i. 2.

3. The watching of a dead body prior to burial by the friends and neighbors of the deceased. Such a custom was formerly prevalent in Scotland, and is still common in Ireland. It probably originated in a superstitious notion with respect to the danger of a dead body being carried off by some of the agents of the invisible world, or exposed to the ravages of brute animals. Though professedly held for the indulgence of reverential sorrow, wakes are too often converted into drunken and riotous orgies.

"The first time I knew him was at my mother's wake."
—Croker: Fairy Legends of Ireland, p. 80.

Wāl-dēn'-sēs, Val-dēn'-sēs, s. pl. [Named from Peter Waldo, their alleged founder, born at Vaux (Lat. Waldum) on the Rhone, early in the twelfth century.]

Church Hist.: A sect which for many centuries has maintained its independence of the Church of Rome, from which it differs in tenets and government. Its chief seats have long been in the three high valleys of Piedmont, situated in the Cottian Alps, on the Italian side of the main chain, but so near the great pass between France and Italy, that French as well as Italian is spoken in the valleys. They claim to have arisen in apostolic times, maintaining an unbroken succession of bishops, but the claim is unfounded, and they probably derived their origin from Peter Waldo [see etym.], a rich merchant of Lyons, and deeply pious man, who at first had no desire to depart from the tenets of the Roman Church, but simply aimed at deepening the religious feeling of its adherents. He was ultimately brought into collision with the Church authorities when, in and after 1160, he had the four gospels translated from Latin into French, and adopted the view that it was lawful for laymen to preach. His opinions spread rapidly; his followers, like himself, not at first greatly differing in doctrine from the Church of Rome. According to Comba (Hist. de Vaudois d'Italie) they had no distinctive Waldensian literature, nor any wide religious influence, until after they had been influenced by the teaching of Wycliffe and his disciple Huss. [HUSSITES.] M. Montet (Histoire Littéraire des Vaudois) divides Waldensian literature into three periods: (1) The Catholic period, during which the dogmas and practices of the Church were accepted. (2) The Hussite period, in which the Pope is fiercely attacked, the Sacraments are invalid by reason of the wickedness of the priests, and there is a strong leaning toward the Universal Priesthood. (3) The Calvinistic period, marked by falsification of documents, forgery, and mutilation, with the object of showing that the Waldensian is a Christian body which had descended from Apostolic times, preserving their faith through the ages in primitive form. This fiction M. Montet has destroyed, though, as he acknowledges, the late Mr. Henry Bradshaw had already exposed the real character of some of the documents adduced. After the Reformation, persecution, which had already been directed against them, became more fierce. Numbers were slain by Francis I. of France in 1545 and 1546, by the Duke of Savoy in 1560, and by Charles Emmanuel II. in 1655. Other persecutions followed in 1663, 1664, and 1686, great sympathy for the sufferers being shown by Protestant nations, especially by England during the Protectorate. Gradually the Waldensians obtained toleration; on December 15, 1853, they received permission from Victor Emmanuel II. to erect a church in Turin, and it is probable that they will unite with the Free Church of Italy. The services are of the plainest type of Genevan Protestantism, the people only joining in the occasional singing of a hymn.

Wāl-dēn'-sī-an, a. & s. [WALDENSES.]

wāl'-lōp-ēr, s. [Eng. wallop; -er.]

1. One who or that which wallops.

2. A pot-walloper (q. v.).

¶ In some states of the Union there has been at various times a property qualification as a prerequisite for voting; particularly was this true in some of the southern states. Thus, in Virginia, prior to the civil war, a man to be entitled to a vote must have a certain amount of taxable property, or in other words a pecuniary interest in the administration of the government. This fact gave rise to the use of the word walloper in connection with the exercise of the right of suffrage. A man who was the head of a family, a householder, was called a pot-walloper, and before he was entitled to a vote, in state elections at least, he must establish the fact that he was a pot-walloper. Hence the word became by metonymy to a qualified voter.

A. As substantive:

1. Bot.: Any species or tree of the genus Juglans, specif. Juglans regia (the Common Walnut), or its fruit. The Common Walnut is a large tree with a thick trunk and deeply furrowed bark, strong, spreading branches, leaves with from five to nine oval, glabrous, slightly serrated, yellowish-green leaflets, which, when bruised, give forth a strong aromatic odor. The fruit has a fleshy husk enclosing the nut, which has a hard shell and two valves; when young it is pickled with the husk; when more mature, it is used as a dessert fruit. The walnut is a native of Ghilan in Persia, immediately south of the Caspian Sea, the northwestern Himalayas, part of China, &c. It was cultivated by the Romans in the first century A. D., or earlier, for its wood and its fruit. In mediæval times it was largely cultivated in Europe for its wood, which was held to be the best known till mahogany was discovered, and is still exceedingly prized for gunstocks, one of the best known species for such purposes being J. nigra, from various parts of this country.

Wāl-pūrg'-is (W as V), s. [See compound.]

Walpurgis-night, s. The eve of May 1, which has become associated with some of the most popular witch superstitions of Germany, though its connection with Walpurgis, Walpurga, or Walburga, a female saint of the eighth century, is not satisfactorily accounted for, her feast falling properly on Feb. 25. On this night the witches were supposed to ride on broomsticks and he-goats to some appointed rendezvous, such as the highest point of the Hartz Mountains or the Brocken, where they held high festival with their master, the devil.

wāl'-rūs, subst. [Orig. from Scandinavian; cogn. with Sw. vallross; Danish hvalros; Icel. (in an inverted form) hross-hvalr=a horse-whale, the name being given (it is suggested) from the noise made by the animal sometimes resembling a neigh; A. S. hors-whæl=horse-whale, a walrus. (Skeat.)]

Zoölogy: Trichechus rosmarus; called also the Morse, Sea-horse, and Sea-cow. The Walrus is now confined to the regions within the Arctic Circle, though its extinct ancestors had a much wider geographical range. It is a large carnivorous marine mammal, ordinarily from ten to twelve feet long, with a girth of nearly as much; "it is said that it sometimes attains a length of twenty feet" (Van Hoveen); muzzle abruptly truncated, with long and remarkably strong bristly moustaches; small eyes; external ear wanting, though the orifice is distinctly visible; body large and sack-like, tapering toward the tail; hind limbs short, connected by a membrane which covers the tail, fore limbs strong and stumpy, all with five digits. The hide is of a tawny-brown color, with difficulty penetrated by bullets, and has been likened to a tough, flexible coat of mail. The upper canines are developed in adults of both sexes into immense tusks, each from fifteen inches to two feet long, and weighing ten pounds and upward. In some individuals the points converge toward, and in others they diverge from each other. This was one reason why Fremery wished to adopt two species; but Sundevall has shown that scarcely two skulls can be examined without minute differences in the size and direction of the tusks being perceived. The most important function of these tusks is digging shell-fish, the favorite food of the Walrus, out of the banks and mud of shoal-water. They are also employed to raise the body out of the water, by digging them into ice-floes, which probably gave rise to the legend of the Rosmarine (q. v.); and they form terrible weapons of offense, as by a quick turn of the neck the animal can strike upward, downward, or sideways with equal dexterity. Walruses are gregarious, and are found on the seashore and on ice-floes; some keep guard while those of the main body sleep, and when danger threatens the sentinels awaken the others by bellowing. They are said to be monogamous, and the female brings forth at nine months one calf, usually on the icefloes. In disposition they are quiet and inoffensive, unless attacked or during the love-season, or if their young are in danger, when they become desperately aggressive, and furiously attack the hunters on the ice or in boats. The habitat of the Walrus and its numbers, owing to reckless slaughter by sealers and whalers, are fast decreasing, and the few remaining seek unfrequented spots in high latitudes inaccessible to sealers. At one time there was a considerable trade in Walrus-hunting, but it is now at a very low ebb; the tusks alone have any commercial value at the present time; but formerly Walrus-hides were used for various purposes, such as machine-bands, &c.

wält, adj. [A. S. wealt = unsteady; unwealt = steady, from wealtan = to roll.]

Naut.: An old term equivalent to crank. (Smyth.)

wält, v. i. [WALT, a.] To roll over; to totter, to fall, to throw, to rush. [WELTER.]

wäl'-tēr, v. i. [WALT, a.]

wältz, s. [A shortened term of Ger. walzer = a jig, a waltz, from walzen = to roll, to revolve, to waltz; cogn. with A. S. wealtan = to roll, to twist.]

Music.:

1. A dance said to have originated in Bohemia, now of almost universal adoption. It is performed by couples, who, almost embracing each other, swing round the room with a whirling motion.

2. The music composed for such a dance. The time is of triple measure in crotchets or quavers, and consists of eight or sixteen bar phrases. Modern waltz-writers frequently add to the original dance-form an introduction and coda. The "Vienna" waltz is characterized by a rapid movement and strict unbroken time. Ländler are slower and more dignified than the waltz. "Classical waltzes" are compositions in waltz-form intended for set pieces, not for dance tunes. In them greater scope is given to the composer and performer than is compatible with the rhythm of the dance.

waltz-song, s. A song written to the rhythm and movement of a waltz.

wältz, v. i. [WALTZ, s.]

1. To dance a waltz.

2. To move as in a waltz; to trip.

1. Having a pale or sickly hue; pallid, pale, languid of look.

"The woman also looked pale and wan."—Bunyan: Pilgrim's Progress, pt. ii.

2. Pale, white.

"With the wan moon overhead."

Longfellow: Beleaguered City.

3. Black, gloomy. (Applied to water, streams, pools, &c.) (Scotch.) wan-thriven, a. Stunted, decayed; in a state of decline. (Scotch.) wān, v. t. & i. [WAN, a.]

A. Trans.: To make or render wan or pale.

B. Intrans.: To become wan or pale.

"All his visage wanned."—Shakesp.: Hamlet, ii. 2.

wān, pret. & pa. par. of v. [WIN, v.] (Scotch.) wān'-chan-čŷ, adj. [A corruption of unchancy (q. v.).] Unlucky. (Scotch.)

"Some wanchancy person—I suspect John Heather blatter the auld gamekeeper."—Scott: Waverley, ch. lxiv.

wānd, s. [Icel. vöndr (genit. vandar) = a wand, a switch; O. Sw. wand; Dan. vaand; Goth. wandus. From O. Scand. wand, vand, pa. t. of O. Sw. winda; Icel. vinda; Dan. vinde = to wind (q. v.).]

1. A small stick, staff, or rod.

"With a single wand in his hand."—Milton: Hist. Brit. ain, bk. iv.

2. A rod or staff, having some special use or character; as—

(1) A rod used by conjurers, diviners, or magicians.

"If I but wave this wand,

Your nerves are all chained up in alabaster."

Milton: Comus, 659.

(2) A staff of authority.

"Then the Corrigidor having an officer with him which bare a white wand in his hand, sayd . . . yeeld your selfe."—Hackluyt: Voyages, ii. 118.

(3) A small baton, forming part of the insignia of the messenger of a court of justice in Scotland, and which he must exhibit before making a caption; called more fully a wand of peace.

"The legal officer, confronted with him of the military, grasped with one doubtful hand the greasy bludgeon which was to enforce his authority, and with the other produced his short official baton, tipped with silver, and having a movable ring upon it—"Captain M'Intyre.—Sir, I have no quarrel with you,—but if you interrupt me in my duty, I will break the wand of peace, and declare myself deposed." . . . And he slid his enigmatical ring from one end of the baton to the other, being the appropriate symbol of his having been forcibly interrupted in the discharge of his duty."—Scott: Antiquary, ch. xlii.

wand-like, a. Like a rod or staff.

"Her stature to an inch; as wand-like straight As silver-voiced; her eyes as jewel-like."

Shakesp.: Pericles, v. 1.

wān'-dēr, *wan-dren, *wan-dri-en, v. i. & t. [A. S. wandrian, a frequent. from wendan = to go, to wend (q. v.); Dut. wandelen = to walk; Ger. wandeln = to wander, to travel, to walk; Dan. vandre; Sw. vandra; O. Dut. wanderen.]

A. Intransitive:

1. To ramble here and there without any certain course or object in view; to travel or move from place to place without any fixed purpose or destination; to rove, range, or roam about; to stroll, to stray.

"Suited to my present wanderings of thought."—Budgell: Spectator, No. 425.

4. Indulgence in digressions or disquisitions foreign to the subject in hand.

¶ The Wandering Jew: A legendary character, condemned to wander from place to place till the Day of Judgment. According to one version, that of Matthew Paris (Chron. St. Alban's Abbey), he was Carophilus, the doorkeeper of the Judgment Hall, in the service of Pontius Pilate, and struck our Lord as he led Him forth, saying, "Get on faster, Jesus!" whereupon our Lord replied, "I am going, but thou shalt tarry till I come again." Another legend is that Jesus, pressed down with the weight of His cross, stopped to rest at the door of one Ahasuerus, a cobbler. The craftsman pushed Him away, saying, "Get off! Away, with you, away!" Our Lord replied, "Truly I go away, and that quickly, but tarry thou till I come." A third legend says that it was the cobbler who hauled Jesus before the judgment seat of Pilate, saying to him, "Faster, Jesus, faster!" The legend has formed the basis of many poems and novels.

Ornith.: Diomedea exulans. [ALBATROSS.]

wān'-dēr-īng-lŷ, *wān'-drīng-lŷ, adv. [Eng. wandering; -ly.] In a wandering, roving, or unsettled manner.

"Genus and species long since barefooted went Upon their ten-toes in wilde wanderment."

Bp. Hall: Satires, ii. 3.

wān'-dēr-oō', wān'-dēr-ū', s. [Fr. Ouanderou, from wanderu, the Cingalese form of Hind. bandar = a monkey.]

Zoölogy:

1. Macacus silenus, from the south of Hindustan, especially the country bordering the Malabar coast. It is about two feet in length, tail ten to twelve inches. The Wanderoos have long, slim bodies, covered with deep-black hair, tail of the same color, tufted. The head looks very large, because of a mane, or ruff, and beard which sticks out round the face. This mass of long hair is either gray or white, and adds to the sly look of the broad face, soft dull eyes, and broad muzzle. The name is misleading, as Macacus silenus is not a native of Ceylon. Mr. Blanford (Proc. Zool. Soc., 1887, p. 623) proposed to substitute for it the name Lion-tailed Monkey, used by Pennant.

2. Any species of the genus Semnopithecus (q. v.). S. ursinus is the Great Wanderoo [MAHA.]

"The name wanderu has clung to the Malabar Monkey ever since [the publication of Buffon's Nat. Hist.]; but really applies, as Templeton, Kelaart, Tennent, and others have shown, to the Ceylonese Semnopithecus, and was rightly employed for those animals by Knox and Ray."—Proc. Zool. Soc. 1887, p. 623.

*wānd'-ŷ, a. [Eng. wand; -y.] Long and flexible, like a wand.

wāne, *waine, *wayne, v. i. & t. [A. S. wanian, wonian = to decrease, to grow less, from wan, won = deficient; cogn. with Icel. vana = to diminish, from vanr = lacking, wanting; O. H. Ger. & M. H. Ger. wanón, wanén = to wane, from wan = deficient.] [WAIST.]

A. Intransitive:

These exhibitions, or meetings, were not designed for military exercises, but only for showing that the lieges were properly provided with arms. The name has been revived in some quarters, and applied to the periodical gatherings of the volunteer corps of a more or less wide district for review, inspection, shooting competitions, and the like.

wā'-pen-tāke, wā'-pen-tāc, s. [A. S. wāpenge-tāce (dat.)=a district, a wapentake, nom. wāpenge-tāc, wāpentāc; Low Latin wapentac, wapentagium, from Iceland vāpnatak=a wapontaking or touching; hence, a vote of consent so expressed, and, lastly, a subdivision of a shire in the Danish part of England corresponding to the hundred in other parts; from Icel. vāpna (genit. pl. of vapn)=a weapon, and tak=a taking, a hold, a grasp, from taka=to take, to seize, to grasp, to touch. The name is derived from the custom of the chiefs of a particular district meeting at a certain day at a specified spot, when the head chief, alighting from his horse, raised his spear in the air, and the inferior chiefs, also on foot, touched their spear with their lances, and so acknowledged their fealty.] A name formerly given in some of the northern shires of England, and still retained in Yorkshire, to a territorial division of the county corresponding to the hundred of the southern counties.

"The hundred and the wapentake is all one, as I read in some, and by this division not a name appertinent to a set number of townes (for then all hundreds should be of equal quantitie) but a limited jurisdiction."—Holinshed: Descript. Eng., bk. ii., ch. iv.

wāp'-i-ti, s. [North Amer. Indian.]

Zoology: Cervus canadensis, a native of North America, ranging from Carolina to 56-57° N. latitude. It is closely allied to but considerably larger than the Stag (q. v.), standing about fifty-four inches at the shoulder. Yellowish brown on upper parts; sides gray, long coarse hair in front of neck, like a dewlap; antlers large, brow-tine duplicated. It frequents low grounds, or woody tracts near savannahs or marshes. The venison is of little value, as it is coarse and dry; but the hide makes excellent leather. Called also, but erroneously, the Elk and Gray Moose.

wërren=to bring into confusion, to entangle, to embroil; O. Dan. werre=war, hostility, from verren, verwerren=to embroil, to bring into disorder or confusion; Dut. war=entanglement, confusion; warren=to disturb, to embroil.]

"Upon the same principle also the sole prerogative of making war and peace is vested in the crown. For the right of making war, which by nature subsisted in every individual, is given up by all private persons that enter into society, and is vested in the sovereign power."—Blackstone: Comment., bk. i., ch. 7.

2. Any contest.

"Excel us in this wordy war."

Pope: Homer's Iliad, ix.

3. The profession of arms; the art of war.

"Nation shall not lift up sword against nation, neither shall they learn war any more."—Isaiah ii. 4.

*4. Instruments of war. (Poetical.)

"The god of love inhabits there,
With all his rage, and dread, and grief, and care;
His complement of stores and total war."

Prior. (Todd.)

*5. Forces, army. (Poetical.)

"On their embattled ranks the waves return,
And overwhelm their war."

Milton: P. L., xii. 214.

6. A state of hostility or violent opposition; a hostile act or action; hostility, enmity.

"Duncan's horses
Turn'd wild in nature, broke their stalls, flung out, Contending 'gainst obedience, as they would Make war with man."

Shakesp.: Macbeth, ii. 4.

¶ The word is sometimes used in the plural form with the same signification as it has in the singular.

"Is Signior Montanto returned from the wars?"

Shakesp.: Much Ado, i. 1.

war-cry, s. A cry or phrase used in war for mutual recognition and encouragement; a short, pithy expression or phrase used in common by a body of troops or the like in charging an enemy.

"And the war-cry was forgotten."

Longfellow: Hiawatha, xiii.

war-dance, s.

1. A dance engaged in by savages, before a warlike expedition.

2. A dance simulating a battle.

war-department, subst. That department of the government which is charged with the maintenance, direction, and efficiency of the forces of a state; specifically, the department of the United States government performing the functions enumerated.

¶ The war department of the United States is under the supervision of a Secretary of War, who has entire control of all matters relating to the equipment, discipline, &c., of the military forces of the country, and is charged with the duty of carrying into effect all laws relative to the army enacted by Congress. His authority in military matters is second only to that of the President of the United States. He is a Cabinet officer, and is usually accounted the third in point of dignity and importance, the portfolios of State and the Treasury being the first two. During the stormy career of the republic this office has several times been one on which devolved the conduct of weighty affairs. The first Secretary of War was Henry Knox of Massachusetts, whose term of office began with that of President Washington. During the second war with Great Britain three secretaries of war followed each other in quick succession. They were John Armstrong, James Monroe, and William H. Crawford. The secretary at the time that war broke out was William Eustis. During the Mexican War William L. Marcy guided the department. During Buchanan's administration, the exciting period just preceding the Civil War, John B. Floyd was the head of the department, and it was charged that his Southern sympathies induced him to store a large amount of war supplies in the South, which supplies when appropriated by the seceding states enabled them to levy war against the general government. He was succeeded by Joseph Holt, who, upon the breaking out of hostilities, severed his connection with the department, and was succeeded by Simon Cameron, who in the same year (1861) gave place to Edwin M. Stanton, under whose guidance the department waged the long and bloody war of secession. Stanton during the reconstruction period was succeeded ad interim by Gen. U. S. Grant, and the following secretaries succeeded in the order named: Lorenzo Thomas, John M. Schofield, John A. Rawlins, William T. Sherman and W. W. Belknap, whose term of office expired when the country was once more in statu quo.

war-drum, s. A military drum.

"Till the war-drum throbbed no longer."

Tennyson: Locksley Hall, 127.

*war-field, s. A battle-field.

"Through the war-field's bloody haze."

Moore: Paradise and the Peri.

*war-flame, s. A beacon-fire placed on an eminence to rouse the inhabitants of a county or district in case of invasion or attack; a fire-signal.

*war-garron, subst. A war-horse; a jade used in war. (Carlyle.)

*war-gear, s. Accouterments or equipment for war.

"Armed himself with all his war-gear."

Longfellow: Hiawatha, ix.

war-god, s.

Anthrop.: The personified spirit of tribal war; a deity supposed to watch over tribal or national interests in time of war. In some cases the war-god seems to have been the chief deity; in classic times the war-gods (Arès and Mars) were among the superior gods; the Jews seem to have conceived that the function of a war-god was a fitting attribute of Jehovah (cf. 2 Sam. xvii. 45); and traces of this mode of thought linger in the familiar expression, The God of Battles.

"Polynesia is a region where quite an assortment of war-gods may be collected."—Tylor: Prim. Cult. (ed. 1873), ii. 307.

war-horse, s. A horse used in war; a charger; a trooper's horse.

"On burnished hooves his war-horse trode."

Tennyson: Lady of Shalott, iii. 29.

*war-man, s. A warrior.

"The sweet war-man is dead and rotten."—Shakesp.: Love's Labor's Lost, v. 2.

*war-marked, a. Bearing the marks or traces of war; approved in war; veteran.

"Distract your army, which doth most consist Of war-marked footmen."

Shakesp.: Antony and Cleopatra, iii. 3.

†war-minister, s. A minister charged with or distinguished for military administration.

"Its new name of Pittsburg commemorates the triumphs of the great war-minister."—Taylor: Words and Places (1878), ch. ii.

*war-monger, s. One who makes a trade or profession of war; a mercenary soldier. (Spenser: F. Q. III. x. 29.)

†war-music, s. Military music.

"And I that prated peace, when first I heard War-music felt the blind wild beast of force."

Tennyson: Princess, v. 256.

*war-note, s. A war-cry.

"The war-note of Lochiel, which Albyn's hills Have heard."

Byron: Childe Harold, iii. 26.

war-office, s. A British public office or department in which military affairs are superintended or administered; it is presided over by the Secretary of State for War, assisted by one parliamentary and one permanent under-secretary of state. It is subdivided into three departments—military, ordnance, and financial, under the control respectively of the commander-in-chief, the surveyor-general of the ordnance, and the financial secretary.

war-paint, s.

1. Lit.: Paint put on the face and other parts of the body by North American Indians and other savages on going to war, with the object of making their appearance more terrible to their enemies.

"Painted was he with his war-paints, Stripes of yellow, red, and azure."

Longfellow: Hiawatha, viii.

2. Fig.: Official costume; applied also to evening dress. (Slang.)

"Sir William Jenner, in his war-paint as President of the Royal College of Physicians."—St. James's Gazette, April 9, 1888.

war-path, s. The route or path taken on going to war; a warlike expedition or excursion. (Used chiefly in regard to North American Indians.)

¶ On the warpath: On a hostile or warlike expedition; hence, colloquially, about to make an attack on an adversary or measure.

war-risk, s. A name given by insurance men to policies written on property obnoxious to destruction or damage by reason of a war then being waged; applied generally to marine insurance.

"The trouble between China and Japan has stimulated marine insurance by creating a demand for war-risks. The war-risk is taken by companies against seizure or destruction of merchandise by a belligerent power."—Chicago Inter-Ocean.

war-ship, s. An armed vessel, for the purpose of waging war upon the water: a naval vessel. [NAVY, CRUISER, IRON-CLAD, TORPEDO-BOAT.]

¶ Warships have always been an important factor in the armament of those states which have a portion or the whole of their territory contiguous to the seas of the world. In no branch of warfare have the means of offense and defense been, in a few years, the subjects of so much change, both in type and effectiveness, as in naval construction and armament. For many centuries after the invention of firearms the progress in the direction of invulnerable war-ships was very slow, and it was not until the naval operations of the American Civil War had given to the civilized nations of earth a great object lesson that the development of ships as fighting machines was accelerated. Prior to that time the strength of naval vessels was considered to lie entirely in the number of men and guns that a ship carried. The building by the Confederate Government of the iron-clad ram "Virginia" directed attention to the value of armor-clad ships, and especially such ships when armed with a beak or ram, as a means of offense. The construction by Captain Ericsson of the "Monitor," and the successful fight of that vessel against the "Virginia," convinced naval architects that the wooden warship had suddenly become obsolete. From this point the development of strength in war-ships is marvelous. Each civilized nation vied with the other in the production of what was vainly imagined would prove invincible and invulnerable ships, but as fast as the defensive power of armor was increased the offensive power of the guns with which other ships were armed was augmented. This led to a great reaction in the methods of naval construction, and the efforts of engineers were directed to the production of warships of the swift cruiser type, rather than that of the battleship, and for awhile the U. S. government constructed only swift armored and protected cruisers. The first contract for first-class battleships for the U. S. navy was signed in 1890, and they were officially designated "coast-line battleships." They were three in number, named respectively the Oregon, the Indiana and the Massachusetts. The first of these to be completed was the Indiana in November, 1895. Half a year later the Massachusetts was commissioned, and a month later, the Oregon. These three battleships are precisely similar in all respects, and represent the first of the type ever attempted by American shipbuilders. They are each of 10,300 tons displacement, and have a main armament of four 13-inch guns in two circular turrets, fore and aft, on the same deck; eight 8-inch guns in four turrets on deck above the deck of the 13-inch guns; and four 6-inch guns on upper deck in broadside. Each has also a secondary battery of rapid-fire guns. These ships cost about $3,100,000 each to build. In one of their prominent features they differ materially from similar ships in foreign navies—that is, in the mounting of 8-inch guns in connection with 13-inch guns and 6-inch guns. This is also the case with the first-class battleship Iowa, that was next constructed, only the latter has 12-inch in place of the 13-inch guns. The Iowa was denominated "seagoing coast-line battleship No. 1." The contract for her construction was signed in Feb., 1893, and she was four years in building, her first commission bearing date of June, 1897. The Iowa has a displacement of 11,340 tons, and her main armament consists of four 12-inch guns in two circular turrets, forward turret on higher deck; eight 8-inch guns in four turrets on same deck as forward 12-inch guns; and six 4-inch guns on upper deck in broadside. She cost over $3,000,000. In 1895, Congress authorized the construction of the Kentucky and the Kearsarge, and three years were given the contractors in which to complete them. Each of these first-class battleships was to be of 11,525 tons displacement and have a main armament of four 13-inch guns in two circular turrets on same deck; four 8-inch guns in two turrets on top of the 13-inch gun turrets; and fourteen 5-inch guns in broadside. Their cost was to be about $2,600,000 each. A year later, in 1896, Congress appropriated money for the construction of the Alabama, the Illinois and the Wisconsin. Each of these new first-class battleships was to be of 11,525 tons displacement, and have a main armament of four 13-inch guns in two elliptical turrets, forward turret on deck higher than the after one, and fourteen 6-inch guns in broadside. These were contracted for in the fall of the same year for about $2,600,000 each, and three years were given as the time in which to build. They are of a different type, in that their armament consists of 13-inch and 6-inch guns to the exclusion of the 8-inch guns. In each succeeding group of our first-class battleships there has been an enlargement of displacement, with the corresponding advantages that go with big ships—namely, better seakeeping and seagoing qualities, larger coal supply, better distribution of the armor, and heavier armament. The last of these advantages—the armament—is, other things being approximately equal, the prime factor determining the value of the battleship as a fighting machine. Besides the main battery armament each of the battleships is provided with a secondary battery, which, in the ships of the Alabama type, consists of sixteen 6-pounder rapid-fire guns, two Colt guns and two field guns. Each is also provided with several torpedo tubes. One very striking advantage these new battleships of the Alabama type have over those previously launched is their high freeboard, giving them splendid seagoing powers and enabling them to work their guns from their great elevation above water in seas so heavy that the guns of the lower vessels would be submerged and useless. Their speed capacity is from 16 to 17 knots an hour, and it is altogether probable that this latest type of American battleship is thus far the supreme achievement in naval construction. [BATTLESHIP.] warehousing-system, s.

Comm.: A customs regulation, by which imported goods may be lodged in public or bonded warehouses, at a reasonable rent, without payment of the duties on importation, until they be withdrawn for home consumption, thus lessening the pressure of the duties, which would otherwise cripple the purchasing power of the merchant. In the United States the warehousing-system has been extended to other than imported goods. Thus spirituous liquors may be deposited by the manufacturer in government warehouses and payment of the internal revenue duty delayed until the liquors are withdrawn. Liquors so held are said to be in bond.

*wäre'-lëss, *ware-lesse, a. [Eng. ware (1), a.; -less.]

"If the sky

Warrant thee not to go for Italy."

May: Lucan; Pharsalia, v.

7. To declare with assurance; to assert as undoubted; to pledge one's word concerning. (Used in asseverations, and followed by a clause.)

"What a galled neck have we here! Look ye, mine's as smooth as silk, I warrant ye."—L'Estrange.

*8. To mark as safe; to guarantee to be safe.

"In a place Less warranted than this, or less secure."

Milton: Comus, 327.

*9. To avow, to acknowledge; to make good; to defend.

"That in their country did them that disgrace,
We fear to warrant in our native place."

Shakesp.: Troilus and Cressida, ii. 2.

II. Law:

1. To secure to, as a grantee an estate granted; to assure.

2. To secure to, as to a purchaser of goods the title to the same, or to indemnify him against loss.

3. To give a pledge or assurance in regard to; as, to warrant goods to be as represented. [WARRANTY.]

"But, with regard to the goodness of the wares so purchased, the vendor is not bound to answer, unless he expressly warrants them to be sound and good."—Blackstone: Comment., bk. ii., ch. 16.

B. Intrans.: To give a warranty; a guarantee.

"Prudent people are just as chary of warranting at auction as when they sell by private contract."—Field, March 17, 1888.

wār'-rant, war-raunt, war-ant, s. [O. Fr. warrant, garant, garant=a warrant, a supporter, a defender; Low Lat. warrantum, warrantum, from O. H. Ger. warjan, werjan; M. H. *2. Security, assurance, guarantee, warrant.

"The matter was first shewed mee by a light felowe who coulde not bring anye witness or warranty of his tale."—Brende: Quintus Curtius, fol. 165.

II. Law:

1. A promise or covenant by deed, made by the bargainer, for himself and his heirs, to warrant or secure the bargainee and his heirs against all men in the enjoyment of an estate or other thing granted. The use of warranties in conveyances has long been superseded by covenants for title, whereby, as the covenantor engages for his executors and administrators, his personal as well as his real assets are answerable for the performance of the covenant.

2. Any promise (express or implied by law, according to circumstances) from a vendor to a purchaser, that the thing sold is the vendor's to sell, and is good and fit for use, or at least for such use as the purchaser intends to make of it. Warranties in insurance are absolute conditions, non-compliance with which voids the insurance. When express, these warranties should appear in the policy, but there are certain implied warranties.

"Some few years ago an ill-advised cabman brought an action in one of the Superior Courts to contend that quiet in harness involved a warranty of soundness."—Field, March 17, 1888.

wār'-rant-ŷ, v. t. [WARRANTY, s.] To warrant, to guarantee.

"The great wart on my left arm."—Shakesp.: Comedy of Errors, iii. 2.

2. Anything resembling a wart; as—

(1) A spongy excrescence on the hinder pasterns of a horse.

(2) A roundish glandule on the surface of plants.

II. Technically:

1. Anat. & Surg. (pl.): Excrescences or small tumors on the skin, consisting of hypertrophied cutaneous papillæ, either with each papilla separate and merely covered with thin cuticle, or with a bundle of them bound together by hard, scaly epithelium. They are generally conical, with a radiated structure, are hard, insensible, and darker than the surrounding parts. They may be caused by whatever irritates the skin, and may occur singly or in groups, generally on the hands or fingers; and are most common in young people. They may in general be cured by attention to cleanliness and by the application of some caustic, or may be removed by a pair of curved scissors, and the wound afterward dressed with a lotion. Sometimes they disappear if stimulated strongly. Warts on the faces of old people, and those produced by soot on chimney-sweeps, are mostly forms of epithelial cancer. Called also Vegetations and Verrucæ.

2. Bot.: [VERRUCA, 1.]

wart-cress, s.

Botany: Senebiera coronopus (= Coronopus ruellii). So named from its wart-shaped fruit.

wart-herb, s.

Bot.: Rhynchosia minima.

Zoöl.: A popular name for either of the species of the genus Phacochærus (q. v.), from the protuberances under the eyes.

The African wart-hog (Phacochærus ælianus), a native of Abyssinia and the central regions of Africa, the coast of Guinea, and Mozambique, is about four feet long, with a naked, slender tail of twelve inches; it is sparsely covered with light-brown bristles, and has a long, stiff mane extending from between the ears along the neck and back. Another species (P. æthiopicus), the Vlacke Vark of the Dutch colonists at the Cape of Good Hope, inhabits the South of Africa, and differs from the first species chiefly in having the facial warts more fully developed in its peculiarly-shaped head. Both species are hunted, and their flesh is in high esteem.

Head of Wart-hog.

wart-shaped, a. [VERRUCÆFORM.]

wart-snakes, s. pl.

Zoölogy: The family Acrochordidæ, consisting of two genera of Innocuous Colubriform Snakes (formerly grouped with the Hydrophidæ), from the Oriental region. wāsp, *waspe, s. [A. S. wæps; cogn. with O. H. Ger. wefsa, wafsa; Ger. wespe; Lat. vespa; Lithuan. wapsa=a gadfly; Russ. osa=a wasp.]

1. Lit. & Entom.: Any species of the genus Vespa or of the family Vespidae (q. v.), particularly the Common Wasp, Vespa vulgaris. It lives in a hole in the ground, generally about six inches beneath the surface, approached by a crooked entrance of about an inch in diameter. This passage leads to a subterranean room, in which is the vespiary made of gray paper or pasteboard in layers one above the other, and constituting a ball of thirteen or fourteen inches in diameter, and pierced with two round holes, through which the wasps come in and go out. The interior is occupied by horizontal tiers of combs, like floors in a house, supported by columns, and with passages between. Each cell is hexagonal, as in the combs of bees, but the material is paper. These tiers of cells are built in succession, the upper ones first. Sexually, wasps are of three kinds, males, females and neuters, the two latter armed with an exceedingly venomous sting. The last are the workers in the hive; they also go out to bring in provisions for the community. Wasps are nearly omnivorous, feeding on honey, jam, fruit, butcher's meat, and any insects which they can overpower. A share of these viands is given to the males and females, whose work lies more in the vespiary. The combs of a large nest may amount to fifteen or sixteen thousand. In these the females, which are few in number, deposit eggs, hatched in eight days into larvae. These again go into the chrysalis state in twelve or fourteen days more, and in ten more are perfect insects. The males do no work. Most of the workers and all the males die at the approach of winter, and in the spring each surviving female, having been impregnated in autumn, looks out for a suitable place to form a new vespiary. A wasp's nest may be destroyed by burning sulphur inside the hole. The economy of the other social wasps is essentially the same, whether like Vespa holsatica, they build a nest of paper in trees, or, like other Polistes, place their combs in trees or bushes without a papery defense. The economy of the solitary wasps is essentially that of their type, Odynurus (q. v.), differing only in the material and locality of their nests, some building them of clay or agglutinated sand, and attaching them to or placing them in holes in walls, while a few burrow in sandy ground. [EUMENIDÆ.]

*2. Fig.: A person characterized by ill-nature, petulance, peevishness, irritability, or petty malignity.

-tion, -șion = zhun. -tious, -cious, -sious = șus. -ble, -dle, &c. = bel, del.

5. In the same sense as II. 1.

6. The period of time during which one person, or a body of persons, watch or stand sentinel, or the time from one relief of sentinels to another; hence, applied to a division of the night when the precautionary setting of a watch is more generally necessary. Among the Romans, the time from sunset to sunrise was divided into four equal spaces or watches, severally distinguished as first, second, third, and fourth watches, each containing three hours; but these hours varied in length, being longest in winter and shortest in summer, and the watch contained three of our hours only at the equinoxes. The Greeks also divided the night into four watches. The proper Jewish reckoning recognized only three of these watches, the first, from sunset till about 10 P. M., the second, or middle watch, from 10 P. M. to 2 A. M., and the third, or morning watch, from 2 A. M. to sunrise. After the establishment of the Roman power, the watches were increased in number to four, which were known as first, second, &c., or as even, midnight, cock-crowing, and morning, the watches terminating respectively at 9 P. M., midnight, 3 A. M., and 6 A. M. (Exodus xiv. 24, Judges vii. 19, Matthew xiv. 25, Mark xiii. 35.)

7. Any contrivance by which the progress of time is perceived and measured; as—

* (1) A candle marked out into sections, each of which denoted a certain portion of time in burning.

"Give me a watch."—Shakesp.: Richard III., v. 3.

(2) A time-keeper actuated by a spring, and capable of being carried on the person. The essential difference between a clock and a watch has been defined to be that the latter will run in any position, but the former in a vertical position only. Since the invention of the cheap spring-clock this definition must be abandoned. Another characteristic which was formerly distinguishing was that the watch escapement was always controlled by a balance-wheel and spring, while the clock escapement was generally governed by a pendulum. Watches are said to have been invented at Nuremberg, about the end of the fifteenth or beginning of the sixteenth century. The essential portions of a watch are the dial, on which the hours, minutes, and seconds are marked, the hands, which by their movement round the dial point out the time, the train of wheels, which carry round the hands, &c., the balance, which regulates the motion of the wheels, and the mainspring, whose elastic force produces the motion of the whole machinery. The works are inclosed in a case of metal, usually silver or gold. The shape is now universally circular and flat, so as to be easily carried in the pocket. The early watches had but one hand, and required winding twice a day. The spring was at first merely a straight piece of steel, not coiled. A spring to regulate the balance was first applied by Dr. Hooke, 1658; this was at first made straight, but soon improved by making it of spiral form. A repeating-watch, or repeater, has a small bell, gong, or other sounding object, on which the hours, half-hours, quarters, &c., are struck on the compression of a spring. The most perfect form of watch is the chronometer (q. v.).

*8. The place where a watch is set or kept.

"I must to the watch."—Shakesp.: Othello, ii. 3.

II. Technically:

1. Nautical:

(1) The period of time occupied by each part of a ship's crew alternately while on duty. This period is one of four hours, the reckoning beginning at noon or midnight. But in order to prevent the constant falling of the same watch to the same portion of the crew, the time between 4 P. M. and 8 P. M. is divided into two short watches of two hours each, technically known as dog-watches. Thus, the watch from 12 noon to 4 P. M. is the first afternoon watch; that from 4 P. M. to 6 P. M. the first dog-watch; and that from 6 P. M. to 8 P. M. the second dog-watch; from 8 P. M. to midnight is the first night-watch; from midnight to 4 A. M. the middle watch; from 4 A. M. to 8 A. M. the morning watch; and from 8 A. M. to noon the forenoon watch. When this alternation of watches is kept up during the twenty-four hours, it is termed having watch and watch, in distinction from keeping all hands at work during one or more watches. An anchor-watch is a small watch composed of one or two men set to look after the ship while at anchor or in port.

(2) A certain portion of the officers and crew of a ship who together attend to working her for a certain period. [(1).] The crew of every ship while at sea is generally divided into two portions—the star-board-watch, which in the merchant service is the captain's watch, and is often commanded by the second mate; and the port-watch, which in the merchant service is commanded by the first mate. In the navy these watches are commanded by the lieutenants successively.

2. Pottery: A trial piece of fire-clay so placed in a pottery-kiln as to be readily withdrawn, to enable the workmen to judge of the heat of the fire and the condition of the ware.

¶ (1) The Black Watch: [BLACK WATCH.]

(2) Watch and ward: The ancient custom of watching by night and by day in towns and cities. A distinction was drawn between the terms watch and ward, the former being applied to watching and guarding by night, and the latter to watching and guarding by day; hence, the expression, watch and ward denotes a constant watching and guarding by day and night.

watch-alarm, s. [ALARM-WATCH.]

watch-barrel, s. The brass box in a watch containing the mainspring.

watch-bell, s.

Naut.: A large bell in ships which is struck when the half-hour glass is run out, to make known the time or division of the watch.

I. Ordinary Language:

1. A clear, colorless, transparent liquid, destitute of taste and smell, and possessing a neutral reaction. It is one of the most important and most widely-distributed substances in nature, occurring universally in one or other of its three physical states = liquid, solid, or gaseous. As a liquid it constitutes the great mass of the oceans, rivers, and lakes, which cover nearly three-fourths of the earth's surface; in the solid state it exists permanently in the form of ice or snow in the polar regions; and as a vapor is a constituent of the aerial envelope of the earth, and the exhalations of volcanoes and boiling springs. It occurs in combination in many mineral substances, and also in organic bodies, animals and plants containing from 80 to 90 per cent. Water is the most efficient of all solvents, there being few substances which are not, to some extent, affected by it, hence natural waters never occur absolutely pure, but contain in solution more or less of the constituents of the strata through which they have passed. Rain-water contains substances derived in minute quantities from the atmosphere, such as ammonia, nitrate of ammonia, carbonic acid, nitrous and sulphurous acids. Spring-water always contains a much larger proportion of dissolved substances than rain-water. When this is so highly charged with saline or gaseous constituents, as to have a peculiar taste or smell, and is unfitted for ordinary use, it is called mineral-water (q. v.), and when the amount of these constituents does not sensibly affect its taste, &c., it is described as fresh-water. Sea-water is essentially a mineral water, its saline constituents consisting of the chlorides and sulphates of sodium, potassium, magnesium, and calcium, together with minute quantities of silica, bromine, iodine, phosphoric acid, &c. The total solid contents of sea-water in mid-ocean varies from 30 to 40 grms. per litre, being largest near the equator and smallest near the poles.

¶ A cubic inch of fresh water at 42° weighs .036126 pounds. A cubic foot weighs 62.321 pounds. A cubic foot contains 6.2321 gallons. One gallon weighs 10 pounds. A ton comprises 35.943 cubic feet. Salt water is slightly heavier than fresh.

2. Water collected in a body, as the ocean, a sea, a lake, a river; any collection of water.

"The annihilating waters roar Above what they have done."

Byron: Heaven and Earth, i. 3.

3. Water from the heavens; rain.

"By sudden floods and fall of waters."

Shakesp.: Richard III., iv. 4.

4. Applied to other fluids, liquid secretions, humors, &c., as:

(1) Tears.

"Then they seemed all to be glad, but the water stood in their eyes."—Bunyan: Pilgrim's Progress, pt. ii.

(2) Urine.

"Carry his water to the wise woman."

Shakesp.: Twelfth Night, iii. 4.

5. Applied to the color or luster of a diamond or pearl, and occasionally of other precious stones; as, a diamond of the first water—i. e., one perfectly pure and transparent.

"The diamonds of a most proved water."

Shakesp.: Pericles, iii. 2.

II. Technically:

1. Chem.: H₂O. Water was long regarded as an element, but toward the end of the seventeenth century it was shown by Lavoisier to be a compound, and to consist of two parts by weight of hydrogen to sixteen of oxygen, or two volumes of hydrogen to one of oxygen. When pure it is free from taste and smell, and at ordinary pressure is liquid between 0° and 100°, boils at 100°, and freezes at 0°C., expanding to the extent of one-eleventh of its volume. The quantity of heat absorbed in the melting of ice is sufficient to raise the temperature of an equal weight of water 79.2°, and the quantity of heat rendered latent by water at 100°, becoming vapor, would raise the temperature of water 5.37 times as much as from 0° to 100°. Water is 825 times heavier than air, and when converted into steam expands to nearly 1,600 volumes. One cubic centimetre at 4°, and under a pressure of 760 mm. of mercury, weighs 15.432349 grains, or one gramme, the unit of weight in the metric system.

2. Comm.: Stock issued without any provision being made for the payment of interest thereon.

"But it is said by the chairman of the Committee on Public Finance, that 'more than half of this stock is water, and could not have come into existence had not this business been superior to the control of competition.'"—St. James's Gazette, June 14, 1888.

3. Geol.: Water is one of the two most potent agencies in working geological changes on the earth's surface. In most cases it acts in direct antagonism to the other very potent cause, fire. Every river descending a mountain-slope, or crossing a plain, to reach the ocean carries with it, especially after heavy rain, abundant sediment, as does every tributary great or small. Much of this sediment reaches the sea, where, if the water be deep, it is lost for a time, while, if the water be shallow, it may gradually build up a delta, which an earthquake shock may convert into land fully reclaimed from the ocean. The boulders, gravel, &c., too heavy to be transported so far, are arranged according to their weight, the heaviest falling first. The expansion of water when it freezes in the crevices of rocks enables it in many cases to rend them asunder, and leave them of more manageable size to be transported. [AQUEOUS, B. 4.]

4. Law: Land is held to include water, but not water land. If the possession of a lake be disputed, the action must be brought, not for so many acres of water, but for so many acres of land covered with water.

¶ (1) Aërated water: Carbonated water. [CARBONATED.]

(2) Hard water: [HARD, 22.]

(3) Mineral waters: [MINERAL.]

(4) Soft water: [SOFT, A. 14.]

(5) Strong waters: [STRONG-WATERS.]

(6) To hold water: [HOLD, v., ¶ 13.]

(7) To keep above water: To keep one's head above water: To manage to struggle through or overcome financial difficulties.

(8) Water of crystallization: [CRYSTALLIZATION, ¶.]

(9) Water on the brain, Water in the head: Path.: A popular name for Hydrocephalus (q. v.).

(10) Where the water sticks: The point in dispute.

water-agrimony, s.

Bot.: Bidens tripartita. (Prior.) It grows in watery places.

water-aloe, s.

Bot.: Stratiotes aloides.

water-analysis, s.

Chem.: The estimation of the dissolved contents of water under the three heads of gaseous, mineral, and organic matter, the latter including floating microcosms; but the term more generally refers, in the case of potable waters, to the determination of the organic matter and total mineral residue, without the separation of the latter into its constituent parts. No process of analysis does more than estimate the relative amount of organic matter; nor, excepting by the aid of the microscope, is any attempt made to differentiate between what is harmless and what is presumably hurtful. Wanklyn's method involves the estimation of the ammonia produced by boiling with permanganate of potash, and the amount of oxygen consumed as shown by the reduction of the permanganate. Frankland proceeds to determine the organic nitrogen and carbon, and from the results arrives at his conclusions respecting the purity of the water. Tidy allows the permanganate to react on the water at common temperatures, and determines the loss of permanganate at the end of one hour and three hours respectively. Whichever method is adopted, there are certain minimum limits below which a water is considered good, and above which it is regarded as either of doubtful quality or likely to prove injurious. The statement of the various limits and attendant circumstances connected with the source of the water supply, and which go to qualify the results obtained, are to be found described at length by the authors referred to in their published methods of analysis.

water-anchor, s.

Naut.: A drag-anchor (q. v.).

water-antelope, s.

Zoölogy:

1. [WATER-BUCK.]

2. (Pl.): A comprehensive name for the genus Eleotragus and its allies, from the fact that most of the species abound in marshy districts on the banks of the African rivers.

water-apple, s.

Bot.: The Custard-apple (q. v.).

water-avens, s. [AVENS.]

water-back, s. A permanent reservoir at the back of a stove or range, to utilize the heat of the fire in keeping a supply of hot water.

water-bailiff, s.

English Law:

1. A custom-house officer in a port town for searching ships.

*2. An officer of the London corporation who saw to the observance of the statutes and bylaws applicable to the river Thames.

3. An officer employed to watch a fishing-river to prevent poaching.

water-balance subst. An oscillating pendulous frame, having a series of troughs in vertical series and inclined in alternate directions, so that, as the frame oscillates, the water dipped by the lower one shall be poured into the next above, which, on the return motion, shall pour it into the next, and so on.

water-barometer, subst. A barometer in which water is employed instead of mercury for indicating the fluctuations in atmospheric density.

1. Ord. Lang.: A water-cask.

2. Mining: A large wrought-iron barrel with a self-acting valve in the bottom, used in drawing water where there are no pumps.

water-barrow, s. A two-wheeled barrow, provided with a tank mounted on trunnions. Used by gardeners and others.

water-bath, s.

I. Ordinary Language:

1. A bath of fresh or salt water, as distinguished from a vapor-bath.

2. A bain-marie.

II. Chem.: A copper vessel, having the upper cover perforated with circular openings from two to three inches in diameter. When in use it is nearly filled with water, which is kept boiling by means of a gas-burner, and the metallic or porcelain basin containing the liquid intended to be evaporated is placed over the openings mentioned above.

bōil, bōy; pōut, lōwl; cat, çell, chorus, çhin, bench; go, gem; thin, ðis; sin, aŷ; expect, Xenophon, exiŷt. ph = f.

water-battery, s.

Elect.: A voltaic battery in which water is the liquid used to excite electric action.

water-baylage, s. (See extract.)

"Water-baylage, a tax demanded upon all goods by the City, imported and exported."—Pepys: Diary, Jan. 20, 1668-9.

water-bean, s.

Bot. (pl.): The order Nelumbiaceæ (q. v.). (Lindley.)

water-bearer, s.

Astron.: Aquarius (q. v.).

water-bearing, s.

Mach.: A contrivance in which water or steam pressure is employed to counterbalance the downward pressure upon a rotating shaft, thereby obviating friction.

water-bears, s. pl.

Zoöl.: Sloth-animalcules (q. v.).

water-bed, s.

1. A bed composed of water, inclosed in a caoutchouc case. On this bed all sensible pressure on any part of the body is removed, so that bed-sores are averted, and great relief from suffering afforded.

*2. A bed on board ship.

water-beetles, s. pl.

Entom.: The Hydradephaga (q. v.).

water-bellows, s. A form of blowing-machine consisting of two or more inverted vessels suspended from the ends of a working-beam, and alternately rising and falling in the cisterns, which are nearly full of water. Induction and eduction pipes pass from below upward into the cisterns, their upper open ends being above the level of the water. The induction-pipes have valves on the top, and the eduction-pipes have valves at the bottom, so that the air cannot pass in the wrong direction.

water-betony, s.

Bot.: Scrophularia aquatica. (Prior.)

Water-betony moth:

Ent.: A European Night-moth, Cucullia scrophulariæ. Fore-wings pale ochre, with a dark-brown stripe, the hinder margin with two whitish crescents. Caterpillar greenish-white, feeding on Scrophularia nodosa and S. aquatica, &c.

water-bewitched, s. A term applied to any very weak liquid or greatly diluted drink.

water-birds, s. pl.

Ornith.: A general term for the Wading and Swimming Birds taken together.

water-blinks, s.

Bot.: Montia fontana.

water-boatmen, s. pl. [NOTONECTIDÆ.]

water-borne, a. Borne by the water; floated; having water sufficient to float.

water-bosh, s. A metallic basiu in a puddling or boiling furnace, which is made double, so that water may circulate therethrough to protect the furnace from the destructive action of heat and sinder.

water-bottle, s. A glass toilet-bottle; a bottle for holding water at table.

water-brash, s. A form of indigestion; called also Water-qualm. [PYROSIS.]

water-break, s. A little wave; a ripple.

water-bridge, s.

Steam: A low vertical partition at the back of a furnace to deflect the flame upward.

water-buck, water-antelope, s.

Zoöl.: Kobus ellipsiprymnus, a large antelope from South Africa. Ground color dark rusty iron-gray or grayish-brown, with an elliptical white patch near the root of the tail. It stands about four feet and a half high at the shoulders.

water-buckler, s.

Bot.: The genus Hydropeltis (q. v.).

water-budget, water-bouget, s.

Her.: A heraldic device intended to represent a vessel, or rather two vessels, connected by a yoke, anciently used by soldiers for carrying water in long marches and across deserts; and also by water-carriers to convey water from the conduits to the houses of the citizens. It is a bearing frequent in English coat-armour. [BOUGET.]

water-bugs, s. pl.

Entom.: A popular name for the Hydrocores (q. v.).

water-butt, subst. A large open-headed cask, usually set upon end in an outhouse or close to a dwelling, and serving as a reservoir for rain or pump-water.

Water-budget.

water-caltraps or caltrops, s.

Bot.: The genus Trapa (q. v.).

water-can, s.

Botany:

(1) Nuphar lutea. So named from the shape of the seed-vessels. (Prior.)

(2) Nymphaea alba. (Britten & Holland.)

water-canker, s.

Pathol.: Ulcerative stomatitis. [NOMA.]

water-carpet, s.

Entomol.: A European geometer moth, Cidaria suffumata, of which two varieties exist. The fore wings in both are very glossy, the former with two, the latter with one shade of brown.

water-carriage, s.

1. Transportation or conveyance by water.

*2. Means of conveyance by water; a vessel or boat.

water-carrier, s.

1. One who conveys water from the conduits, wells, &c., to the houses of the citizens.

2. A form of water-elevator in which the bucket lifted from the well or cistern is transported on wires to the house at a considerable distance.

3. A grip or furrow for conveying water overland.

"Grips and water-carriers pervade the whole area of this river-basin."—Field, Feb. 13, 1886.

water-cart, s. A cart carrying water for sale, or for watering streets, gardens, &c. In the latter case it contains a large tank, at the end of which runs a pipe perforated with small holes, through which the water is sprinkled on the streets, &c.

water-cask, s. A large strong, hooped barrel, used in ships for holding water for use on board.

water-caster, s. A urinalist (q. v.).

"A face with rubies mixed like alabaster, Wastes much in physicke and her water-caster."
Taylor (The Water-poet).

water-cement, s. A cement which possesses the property of hardening under water, and is therefore employed in structures which are built under water, and also for lining cisterns, coating damp walls on basement stories, &c.

water-chats, s. pl.

Ornith.: Swainson's name for the Fluvicolinæ (q. v.).

water-chestnut, s.

Bot.: Trapa natans. The English name is translated from the French Marron d'eau.

water-chickweed, s.

Bot.: Montia fontana.

water-chrysolite, s. [BOTTLE-STONE.]

water-cicadas, s. pl.

Entom.: The same as WATER-BOATMEN. (Swainson.)

water-clock, s. An instrument to indicate the time by the passage of water into or from a vessel. [CLEPSYDRA.]

water-closet, s. A commode with water supply to flush the basin, carry off the contents, and prevent the rise of sewer-gas.

water-color, water-colour, s. & a.

A. As substantive:

1. A color carefully ground up with water and isinglass, or other mucilage, instead of oil. Water-colors are often prepared in the form of small cakes dried hard, which can be rubbed on a moistened palette when wanted. Moist water-colors in a semi-fluid state are also used. They are generally kept in metal tubes, which preserve them from becoming dry and hard.

"Such water-colors, to impaint his cause."

Shakesp.: Henry IV., Pt. I., v. 1.

2. A water-color painting.

"The water-colors exhibited by Mr. Gifford are remarkable for nicety of observation."—Scribner's Magazine, Sept., 1878, p. 313.

B. As adj.: Painted or executed in water-colors.

Water-color painting:

1. The art of painting in water-colors.

2. A painting executed in water-colors.

water-colorist, water-colourist, s. One who paints in water colors.

water-column, s. A column or pillar of water.

"Rising like water-columns from the sea."

Byron: Child Harold, iv. 18.

water-course, s. [WATERCOURSE.]

water-craft, s. Vessels or boats plying on water.

†water-crake, s.

Ornith.: The Water-ousel (q. v.). (Willughby: Ornithology (ed. Ray), p. 149.)

water-crane, s. A goose-neck apparatus for supplying water from an elevated tank to the tender of a locomotive-engine.

†water-crow, s.

Ornithology:

1. [See extract under OUSEL, s., ¶ (2).]

2. [WATER-TURKEY.]

water-crowfoot, s.

Bot.: Ranunculus aquatilis. The stem is submerged, the leaves beneath the water being capillaceously multifid, those which float trifid or tripartite, with cut or crenated lobes, the petals white. Common in lakes, ponds, and ditches, flowering from May to August.

water-cup, s.

Bot.: The genus Hydrocotyle (q. v.).

water-cure, subst. The same as HYDROPATHY (q. v.).

water-deck, s.

Mil.: A painted piece of canvas used for covering the saddle and bridle, girths, &c., of a dragoon's horse. (Annandale.)

water-deer, s.

Zoöl.: Hydropotes inermis, a small deer from China. It is about the size of the Muntjac (q. v.), which it resembles in having the upper canines developed into tusks, but there is no tuft on the head. Color light red-brown.

water-deerlet, s.

Zoöl.: Tragulus aquaticus, from Sierra Leone and the Gambia district. Coat deep glossy brown, with longitudinal white stripes, and irregularly spotted with white.

water-deity, s.

Anthrop.: A deity supposed to preside over some river, sea, or lake. (See extract under WATER-WORSHIPER.)

water-demon, s.

Anthropology: A demon supposed to inhabit the water. (See extract under WATER-KELPIE.)

water-devil, s.

Entomol.: Hydrous or Hydrophilus piceus.

water-distilling ship, s. The same as Distilling-ship (q. v.).

water-dock, s.

Botany: Rumex hydrolapathum, a large, erect branched dock, three to six feet high, growing in ditches and by river-sides.

water-doctor, s.

1. A urinalist (q. v.).

2. A hydropathist.

water-dog, s.

1. A dog accustomed to the water, and having considerable swimming-powers; specifically, a water-spaniel (q. v.).

2. A name given in some parts of the United States to various species of salamanders.

3. A name for small, irregular, floating clouds in a rainy season, supposed to indicate rain. (Prov. & Scotch.)

4. A sailor, especially an old sailor; an old salt. (Colloq.) [SEA-DOG, 3.]

water-drain, s. A drain or channel for carrying off water.

water-drainage, s. The drainage off of water.

water-dressing, s.

Surg.: The treatment of wounds and ulcers by the application of water, or of dressings saturated with water only.

water-drop, s. A drop of water; hence, a tear. (Shakesp.: Lear, ii. 4.)

water-dropwort, s. [CENANTHE.]

water-elder, s.

Botany: Viburnum opulus. (Prior.) [GUELDER-ROSE.]

water-elephant, s. A name sometimes given to the hippopotamus.

water-elevator, s.

1. A contrivance for raising buckets in wells. The forms are various.

2. An elevator for warehouses and other buildings, operated by water acting through the medium of gravity or by hydraulic pressure.

water-engine, s.

1. An engine driven by water, as a water-wheel. The term is somewhat more definitely applied to an engine in which water under pressure of a head acts upon a piston.

2. An engine to raise water.

water-ermine, s.

Entomology: A Tiger-moth, Arctia urticae. Wings white, the fore pair each with a black dot; head and thorax white, body yellow, the tip snowy white, fāte, fāt, fāre, amidst, whāt, fāll, father; wē, wēt, hēre, camēl, hēr, thēre; pīne, pīt, sīre, sīr, marine; gō, pōt ar, wōre, wōlf, wōrk. whō, sōn; mūte, cūb, cūre, unite. cūr, rāle, fūll; trȳ, Sȳrian. æ, œ = ē; ey = ē. qu = kw with a row of black spots down the back, and one on each side. Caterpillar black, very hairy. It feeds in marshy places on mint, willow-herb, &c., concealing itself on the under side of the leaves. The moth appears in June.

water-featherfoil, s.

Bot.: Hottonia palustris. (Prior.)

water-fennel, s.

Botany:

1. Oenanthe phellandrium. (Prior.)

2. Callitriche verna. (Britten & Holland.) [WATER-STARWORT.]

water-fern, s.

Bot.: (1) Osmunda regalis; (2) Ceratopteris thalictroides. Its fronds are boiled and eaten in the Indian Archipelago.

water-fight, s. A naval engagement.

"Such a various and floating water-fight."—Milton: Hist. England, bk. ii.

water-fire, s.

Botany: Bergia ammanoides, a species of water-pepper found on the borders of Indian tanks. The trivial name is translated from the Tamil Neer-mel-neripoo.

water-flag, s.

Bot.: Iris pseudacorus.

water-flannel, s.

Botany:

1. Conferva crispata, one of the Confervas forming beds of entangled filaments on the surface of water. [CROW-SILK.]

2. Water-net (q. v.).

water-flea, s.

Zoöl.: A popular name for any of the Branchiopoda (q. v.).

water-float, s. A device in a cistern, boiler, &c., which, floating on the water, actuates a valve.

water-flood, s. A flood of water; an inundation.

water-flower, s.

Bot.: Geum rivale. (Britten & Holland.)

water-flowing, a. Flowing like water; streaming.

"My mercy dried their water-flowing tears."

Shakesp.: Henry VI., Pt. III., iv. 8.

water-fly, s.

1. Ordinary Language and Entomology:

(1) The genus Perla (q. v.). Applied loosely to any winged insect frequenting the surface of water.

(2) The genus Gyrinus (q. v.).

*2. Fig.: Used as an emblem of emptiness and vanity.

"Dost know this water-fly?"—Shakesp.: Hamlet, v. 2.

water-fowl, s.

1. A bird that frequents the water, or lives about rivers, lakes, or in or near the sea; an aquatic-fowl. The term is generally applied to web-footed birds, but is also used of herons, plovers, and other birds that frequent rivers, lakes, and the sea-shore.

2. Such birds collectively; wild fowl.

water-fox, subst. A name given to the carp, on account of its supposed cunning.

"As the carp is accounted the water-fox for his cunning, so the roach is accounted the water-sheep."—Walton: Angler.

water-frame, s. A name given to the spinning-jenny, from the fact that at first it was driven by water.

water-furrow, v. t. To drain by drawing furrows across the ridges in the lowest part of the ground.

"Water-furrow thy ground,

That raine, when it cometh, may run away round.

Tusser. Husbandrie, p. 48.

water-furrow, s.

Agric.: A channel, furrow, or grip for conducting water from the land; a watercourse.

water-gage, s. [WATER-GAUGE.]

water-gall, s.

1. A cavity made in the earth by a torrent of water.

2. An appearance in the sky known from experience to presage the approach of rain; a rainbow-colored spot; an imperfectly formed, or a secondary rainbow; a weather-gall.

"These water-galls . . . foretell new storms."

Shakesp., Rape of Lucrece, l. 588.

water-gang, s. A trench or course for conveying a stream of water.

water-gas, s. Gas obtained by the decomposition of water. Water in the form of steam is passed over red-hot coke, resolving it into hydrogen and carbonic oxide, the oxygen being absorbed. The hydrogen and carbonic oxide are then passed through a retort, in which carbonaceous matter, such as resin, is undergoing decomposition, absorbing therefrom sufficient carbon to render it luminous when burned.

water-gate, s. A water plug or valve.

water-gauge, s.

1. Ord. Lang.: A wall or bank to restrain or hold back water.

2. Steam-eng.: An instrument or attachment to a steam-boiler to indicate the depth of water therein.

water-gavel, s.

Law: A rent paid for fishing or any other benefit derived from some river.

water-germander, s.

Bot.: Teucrium Scordium.

water-gilder, s. One who practices the art of water-gilding (q. v.).

water-gilding, s. A mode of gilding by an amalgam in which the articles are pickled and then dipped in or brushed with a dilute solution of nitrate of mercury and gold, called quick-water, which leaves a film of amalgam on the surface. After dipping, the articles are exposed to heat in a cage within a furnace, and the mercury is thus driven off. The gold surface is then polished with a bloodstone burnisher.

water-gladiole, s.

Bot.: The genus Butomus. (Gerarde.)

water-glass, s.

*1. A water clock or clepsydra.

2. Soluble glass (q. v.).

water-god, s.

Anthrop.: (See extract.)

"Divine springs, streams, and lakes, water-spirits, deities concerned with the clouds and rain, are frequent, and many details of them are cited here, but I have not succeeded in finding among the lower races any divinity whose attributes, fairly criticised, will show him or her to be an original and absolute elemental Water-god."—Tylor: Prim. Cult. (ed. 1873), ii. 274.

water-gruel, subst. A liquid food composed of water and a small portion of meal or other farinaceous substance boiled and seasoned with salt.

"I could eat water-gruel with thee a month for this jest."—Ben Jonson: Cynthia's Revels, ii. 1.

water-gut, s.

Bot.: The genus Enteromorpha (q. v.).

water-hammer, s. (See extract.)

"In a vacuum, however, liquids fall like solids without separation of their molecules. The water-hammer illustrates this: The instrument consists of a thick glass tube about a foot long, half filled with water, the air having been expelled by ebullition previous to closing one extremity with the blow-pipe. When such a tube is suddenly inverted, the water falls in one undivided mass against the other extremity of the tube, and produces a sharp, dry sound, resembling that which accompanies the shock of two solid bodies."—Atkinson: Ganot's Physics, § 77.

water-hemlock, s.

Bot.: The genus Cicuta (q. v.).

water-hemp, s.

Bot.: Bidens tripartita.

Water-hemp agrimony:

Bot.: (1) [WATER-HEMP.] (2) The Hemp-agrimony (q. v.).

water-hen, s.

Ornith.: Gallinulus chloropus, generally distributed throughout the world. Length of male about thirteen inches; back, wings, rump, and tail rich dark olive-brown; head, neck, breast, and sides dark slate-gray; thighs and flanks streaked with white, belly and vent grayish white; under tail-coverts white; beak yellowish, becoming red, as Pennant notes, in the breeding season; naked patch on forehead red; red garter above tarsal joint; legs and toes greenish-yellow, claws dark-brown. The female rather larger and more vividly-colored than the male. They frequent ponds covered with aquatic herbage, overgrown watercourses, and the banks of slow rivers, swimming and diving with facility, assisted by an expansion of the membrane along the sides of the toes.

water-hog, s.

Zoölogy:

1. A popular name for any species of Potamochoerus (q. v.).

"The species of Potamochoerus frequent swampy grounds, and sometimes receive the name of water-hog."—Chambers's Encyc. (ed. 1868), x. 73.

2. The genus Hydrochoerus (q. v.).

water-hole, s.

Mining: A sump (q. v.).

water-horehound, s.

Bot.: Lycopus europæus.

water-horsetail, s.

Bot.: The genus Chara (q. v.).

water-hyssop, s.

Bot.: Gratiola officinalis.

water-inch, s.

Hydraul.: A measure of water equal to the quantity discharged in the twenty-four hours through a circular opening of one inch diameter leading from a reservoir under the least pressure, that is when the water is only so high as to cover the orifice. This quantity is 500 cubic feet very nearly.

water-indicator, s. A water-gauge (q. v.).

water-injector, subst. A form of pump used on steam boilers.

water-kelpie, s.

Anthrop.: A water-spirit (q. v.).

"That confusion between the spiritual water-demon and the material water-monster, which runs on into the midst of European mythology in such conceptions as that of the water-kelpie and the sea-serpent."—Tylor: Prim. Cult. (ed. 1873), ii. 210.

water-lade, s. A gutter, a drain.

"The water-lades [were] stopped up."—P. Holland: Camden, p. 741.

water-laid, a. Coiled "against the sun," that is, over to the left; as, a water-laid rope.

Bot.: (1) The genus Hydrophyllum; (2) Rhodymenia palmata.

water-leg, s. A vertical water-tube in a steam-boiler, connecting other water-spaces, and crossing a flue-space by which its contents are heated.

water-lemon, s.

Bot.: Passiflora laurifolia.

water-lentil, water-lens, s.

Bot.: The genus Lemna (q. v.).

water-lettuce, s.

Bot.: Pistia stratiotes. (West Indian.)

water-level, s.

1. The level formed by the surface of still water.
2. A leveling instrument in which water is employed instead of spirit. It consists of a metal tube, bent at both ends, in which are fitted glass tubes. It is placed on a tripod, and water poured in until it rises in both legs. When the liquid is at rest, the level of the water in both tubes is the same; that is, they are both in the same horizontal plane.

water-lily, s.

*Bot.: The popular name for various plants of the order Nymphæacæ, the resemblance of which to the Lilium, or true lily genus, is not close, they being exogenous and it endogenous. The White Water-lily is Nymphæa alba, the Yellow Water-lily, Nuphar lutea.*

"Where among the water-lilies Pishnekuh, the brant, were sailing,"

Longfellow: Hiawatha, xvii.

water-lime, s. Hydraulic lime.

water-line, s.

1. Shipbuild.: One of the ship's lines drawn parallel with the surface of the water, at varying heights. In the sheer plan they are straight and horizontal; in the half-breadth plan they show the form of the ship at the successive heights marked by the water-lines in the sheer plan. [KEY-MODEL.]

2. Naut.: The line up to which the hull of a vessel is submerged in the water.

water-lizards, s. pl.

Zoöl.: The Monitoriæ or Varanidæ (q. v.).

water-locust, s.

Botany: Gleditschia monosperma, the Swamp Locust-tree (q. v.).

water-lot, s. A name given in San Francisco to a building lot near the water of the bay, and sometimes inundated by the tide.

water-lotus, s.

Bot.: Nelumbium speciosum.

water-lute, s. An air-trap (q. v.).

water-mark, s.

I. Ordinary Language:

1. The mark or limit of the rise of a flood; the mark indicating the rise and fall of the tide.

2. The same as WATER-LINE (q. v.).

II. Paper-making: Any distinguishing device or devices indelibly stamped in the substance of a sheet of paper while yet in a damp or pulpy condition. The device representing the water-mark is stamped in the fine wire gauze of the mold itself. The design is engraved on a block, from which an electrotpe impression is taken; a matrix, or mold, is similarly formed from this. These are subsequently mounted upon blocks of lead or guttapercha, to enable them to withstand the necessary pressure, and serve as a cameo and intaglio die, between which the sheet of wire gauze is placed to receive an impression in a stamping-press. The water-marks used by the earlier paper-makers have given names to several of the present standard sizes of paper, as pot, foolscap, crown, elephant, fan, post.

"The water-mark on Mr. Denison's manuscript consists of an open hand."—Athenæum, May 3, 1884, p. 563.

water-meadow, s. A meadow capable of being kept in a state of fertility by being flooded with water at certain seasons from an adjoining stream. Generally applied to meadows intersected by channels, which, by means of dams, can at any time be made to overflow the land.

water-measure, s. A measure formerly in use for articles brought by water, as coals, oysters, &c. The bushel used for this purpose was larger than the Winchester bushel by about three gallons.

water-measurer, s.

Entom. (pl.): A book-name for the Hydrometridæ (q. v.).

water-melon, s.

Bot.: Citrullus vulgaris (=Cucumis citrullus). The leaves are deeply lobed and gashed; the fruit large, round, with a spotted rind; cold, watery, pink or white flesh, and black seeds. It is cultivated in the United States, India, China, Japan, the Eastern Peninsula, Egypt, &c., for its juice, which is cool and refreshing, but somewhat insipid. It is the melon of Scripture. [MELON, 2.]

water-meter, s.

1. A contrivance for measuring the amount of water received or discharged through an orifice. There are numerous varieties.

2. An instrument for determining the amount of water evaporated in a given time, as from a steam-boiler.

water-mice, s. pl.

Zoöl.: The genus Hydromys (q. v.), sometimes elevated to a sub-family (Hydromyinae). The species are small rat-like animals of slender form, with long tails and short limbs; toes partially webbed.

water-milfoil, s.

Bot.: Myriophyllum verticillatum.

water-mill, s. A mill whose machinery is moved by the agency of water.

water-mint, s.

Bot.: Mentha aquatica, a mint having the leaves ovate, serrate, stalked, the flowers dense in terminal obtuse heads or spikes, or sometimes in remote axillary whorls. It is frequent by the side of rivers and marshes.

water-opossum, s. [YAPOCK.]

water-ordeal, s. An ancient form of trial by means of water. [ORDEAL, WITCH.]

water-ousel, s. [OUSEL, s., ¶ (2).]

water-oven, s.

Chem.: An apparatus employed for drying substances, at or near the temperature of boiling water, without the vessel containing them coming in contact with the vapor of water, as in the case of the open water-bath. It consists usually of an oblong copper vessel, surrounded with a jacket of the same metal, the intervening space being nearly filled with water, which is kept continuously at the boiling-point by means of a gas-burner placed under the apparatus. The steam generated in the interior is condensed by passing through a lengthened vertical pipe, by means of which the water again returns to the vessel. If it is desired to attain a heat rather over 100°, a little salt is dissolved in the water contained in the apparatus.

water-packer, s.

Well-boring: A cap on the top of a pipe to exclude surface-water.

water-padda, s.

Zoöl.: Breviceps gibbosus, a toad from the Cape of Good Hope. Upper surface with small warts, belly granulate. Brown above, with a broad, brownish-yellow, serrated dorsal band; an obsolete lateral streak of the same color.

water-quintain, s. A tilt on the ice. (Strutt.) water-rabbit, s.

Zoöl.: Lepus aquaticus, an American species, most abundant in the swampy tracts bordering on the Mississippi and its tributaries in the southwestern States, whence it is also called the Swamp Hare. It is an excellent swimmer, and subsists chiefly on the roots of aquatic plants. Fur dark grayish-brown above, white below, coarse in texture; ears and tail long.

water-radish, s.

Bot.: Nasturtium amphibium, an aquatic plant, two to four feet high, with pinnatifid leaves and yellow flowers, growing in wet places, and flowering from June to September.

water-rail, s.

Ornith.: Rallus aquaticus, generally distributed over America and Europe, and fairly common, though not often seen, from its shy, retired habits. The male is about eleven inches in length, female somewhat smaller; general plumage brown, streaked with black; lores and eyebrows, sides of face, and underparts slaty-gray. It frequents marshes and bogs, and swims and dives well, but is bad on the wing. It is a delicious bird for the table.

water-ram, s. A machine for raising water; a hydraulic ram.

water-rat, s.

Lit. & Zoöl.: A common but misleading popular name for Arvicola amphibius, the Water-vole (q. v.).

water-rate, s. A rate or charge for the supply of water.

water-rattle, s.

Zoölogy: Crotalus adamanteus, the Diamond Rattlesnake. It sometimes reaches eight feet in length; yellowish-brown with dark brown spots, belly yellowish, tail black or barred with black. Found in damp and shady places from North Carolina to Texas, and varieties of it range into California and Mexico. It is exceedingly poisonous.

water-reed, s.

Bot.: The genus Arundo (q. v.).

water-retting, s. [RETTING.]

water-rice, s.

Bot.: Zizania aquatica.

water-rites, s. pl.

Anthropology: Rites connected with water-worship (q. v.).

"Elsewhere in Europe, the list of still-existing water-rites may be extended."—Tylor: Prim. Cult. (ed. 1873), ii. 214.

Naut.: A sail set in very light airs and smooth water, below the lower studding-sail booms and next to the water.

water-salamander, s.

Zoöl.: A newt (q. v.).

water-sallow, s. [WATER-WILLOW.]

water-sapphire, s.

Min.: A jeweler's name for the transparent variety of Iolite (q. v.), to distinguish it from the Oriental Sapphire (Corundum).

water-scorpions, s. pl. [NEPIDÆ, NEPÆ.]

water-screw, s. An Archimedean screw (q. v.).

fâte, fât, färe, amidst, whât, fâll, father; wê, wêt, hêre, camêl, hêr, thêre; pine, pît, sîre, sîr, marine; gô, pôť, or, wôre, wôlf, wôrķ, whô, sôn; mûte, cûb, cûre, unite, cûr, râle, fûll; trÿ, Sÿrian. æ, œ = ê; ey = â. qu = kw.

water-sheep, subst. [See extract under WATER-ROX.]

water-shell, s.

Ordn.: A common shell or cast-iron cylinder, filled with water, into which is fitted a small cylinder containing a quarter, or, at the most, half an ounce of gun-cotton; it is then hermetically sealed; a few grains of fulminate of mercury are placed between the gun-cotton and the fuse, and, as soon as the latter is fitted, the shell is ready for firing.

water-shield, s.

Botany:

1. The genus Hydropeltis.

2. (Pl.): The order Cabombaceæ (q. v.).

water-shoot, s.

1. A sprig or shoot from the root or stock of a tree. (Prov.)

2. A wooden trough for discharging water from a building. (Gwilt.) water-shrew, s.

Zoöl.: Crossopus fodiens, common over the continent of Europe as far north as the Baltic, found in many parts of Britain, but not known to occur in Ireland. About three inches long, tail two inches; generally black above and white beneath; but there is great variation in the color of different specimens, some of which have been described as distinct species. [OARED-SHREW.]

water-shut, s. A well-cover.

"A large, well-squared stone, which he would cut

To serve his style, or for some water-shut."

Browne: Britannia's Pastorals.

water-side, s. [WATERSIDE.]

water-sky, s. [For def. see extract.]

"Navigators can judge of the extent of ice beyond the horizon by a peculiar glistening of the atmosphere known as the ice-blink; over open water the sky looks dark and is known as water-sky."—Ripley & Dana: Amer. Cyclop., iii. 658.

water-slater, s.

Zoöl.: The genus Asellus.

water-snail, s.

1. Hydr.: A spiral pump (q. v.).

2. Zoöl. (pl.): A general name for snails inhabiting water, as the Limnæidæ. It is opposed to the term Land Snails, as the Helicidæ.

water-snake, s.

1. Tropidonotus natrix. [SNAKE.]

2. Any individual of the Hydrophidæ (q. v.).

water-soak, v. t. To soak or fill the interstices of with water.

water-socks, s.

Bot.: Nymphæa alba. (Britten & Holland.)

water-sodden, adj. Soaked and softened in water.

water-soldier, s.

Botany:

1. The genus Stratiotes (q. v.); spec., S. aloides.

2. Pistia stratiotes. (Loudon.) water-spaniel, s. [SPANIEL, A. 1. (2).]

water-speedwell, s.

Bot.: Veronica maritima.

water-spider, s.

1. Entom.: The genus Hydrometra (q. v.).

2. Zoöl.: The Diving-spider (q. v.). Applied also to any of the Natantes (q. v.).

water-spike, s.

Bot.: The genus Potamogeton (q. v.).

water-spirit, s.

Anthrop.: A spirit supposed to reside in lakes, rivers, and the sea. Water-spirits were believed to be the active agents in all cases of drowning and shipwreck, and to avenge the rescue of drowning persons on their rescuers. Hence arose the widespread superstition that it was unlucky to save a shipwrecked person or one who had fallen into the water. (Cf. Scott: Pirate, ch. vii.) The belief in water-spirits was almost universal at an early stage of culture, and still lingers in a poetic form on the banks of the Rhine. (Cf. Heine's Lorelei.) [WATER-WORSHIP. See also extract under WATERMAN, II.]

"From this point of view, it is obvious that, to save a sinking man is to snatch a victim from the very clutches of the water-spirit, a rash defiance of deity which would hardly pass unavenged."—Tylor: Prim. Cult. (ed. 1873), i. 110.

water-sprite, s. A sprite or spirit inhabiting the water.

"As if it dodged a water-sprite."

Coleridge: Ancient Mariner.

water-standing, adj. Perpetually filled with tears; wet.

"Many an orphan's water-standing eye."

Shakesp.: Henry VI., Pt. II., v. 6.

water-tight, a. [WATERTIGHT.]

water-tofana, s. [AQUA-TOFANA.]

water-torch, s.

Bot.: Typha latifolia.

water-tree, s.

Bot.: Tetracera alnifolia, a tree about sixteen feet high, with yellow flowers, growing in Guinea. The Red Water-tree is Erythra phlæum guiniense.

water-trefoil, s.

Bot.: Menyanthes trifoliata. [MENYANTHES.]

water-trunk, s. A square rain-water pipe.

water-tupelo, s.

Bot.: Nyssa denticulata. It is a large tree, growing in the Southern States of America, and yielding a fruit sometimes made into a preserve.

water-turkey, s.

Ornith.: Plotus anHINGA.

"This bird is a constant resident in Florida, and the lower parts of Louisiana, Alabama, and Georgia; in spring it goes up as far north as North Carolina, breeding along the coast; in these various localities it bears the name of water crow, Grecian Lady, water turkey, and cormorant."—Ripley & Dana: Amer. Cyclop., v. 692.

water-tuyere, water-twyer, s.

Metall.: A tuyere so constructed that cold water is made to flow in a continuous stream around a blast of air.

water-twist, s.

Cotton-manuf.: Yarn made by the water-frame (q. v.).

water-twyer, s. [WATER-TUYERE.]

water-vascular, a.

Biol.: A term applied to a system of canals, in the Annuloidæ. They communicate with the exterior, and open internally into the perivisceral cavity. Their function is not certainly known, but they are probably excretory and respiratory.

water-vine, s.

Botany:

1. Phytocrene gigantea, a large climber occurring in Martaban. The wood, which is soft and porous, discharges when wounded a quantity of pure, tasteless, and wholesome fluid, drunk by the natives.

2. Tetracera potatoria, a climber about twenty feet long, with yellow flowers. A native of Sierra Leone.

Bot.: The genus Hottonia (q. v.).

water-viper, s.

Zoölogy: Cenchrus piscivorus; a venomous snake, about forty-four inches long, ranging over the southern states of the union from the Carolinas to Texas. Greenish-brown, yellowish on sides, banded with blackish-brown. Called also Cotton Mouth and Water Moccasin Snake.

Zoöl.: Arvicola amphibius, popularly known as the Water-rat. It is a small rodent, about a foot long, of which the tail occupies nearly five inches. Fur thick and shining, rich reddish-brown above, yellowish-gray beneath. These animals haunt the banks of rivers and ponds, and, though the feet are not webbed, swim with facility not only on the surface, but below the water. They have been accused of destroying fish-spawn, and feeding on young fish and even on ducklings, but the charge is probably unfounded, as their food appears to be entirely vegetable. Common in England, throughout Europe and Asia, to China.

Ornithology:

1. The Pied Wagtail, Motacilla lugubris, a well-known European bird. Length, about seven inches; forehead, cheeks, sides of neck, and lower parts pure white; back and sides ash color, the rest black; wing-coverts black, bordered with white, two outer tail-feathers white. In winter the black patch on throat is diminished to a circlet.

2. (Pl.): Any species of the genus Motacilla as distinguished from Budytes (q. v.).

Bot.: The genus Ulva (q. v.).

water-way, s.

I. Ordinary Language:

1. That part of a river, arm of the sea, &c., through which vessels enter or depart; the fair-way.

2. A navigable stream, canal, or the like.

"They have decided to lay down light rails along the banks of this water-way, which is their own property, and to tow the barges with small steam-engines instead of with horses."—London Daily Chronicle.

II. Shipbuild.: A strake on the inside of a vessel above the ends of the beams. It is bolted downward through the beam and shelf, and laterally through the futtock and planking. It is also secured by a fore-and-aft dowel to the beam. It forms a channel to lead the water to the scuppers. In iron vessels the water-ways assume many different forms.

"A good-sized stern locker and water-ways."—Field, Feb. 11, 1888.

water-weak, a. Weak as water; very feeble.

"If Iustie now, forthwith am water-weak."

Davies: Muses Sacrifice, p. 10.

water-weed, s.

Bot.: A common name for aquatic plants generally, but applied specifically to Anacharis alsinastrum, or Water-thyme.

Hydraulics:

1. A kind of wheel for raising water in large quantities.

2. A wheel moved by water, and employed to turn machinery. There are four principal kinds of water-wheels—the overshot wheel, the undershot wheel, the breast wheel, and the turbine (see these terms).

3. The paddle-wheel of a steamer.

water-willow, s.

Bot.: Salix aquatica, called also Water-sallow.

water-wing, s. A wall erected on the bank of a river, next to a bridge, to secure the foundations from the action of the current.

water-witch (or wizard), s. An individual who pretends to be able by divination to discover the course of a subterranean vein of water; they are much in request in some places for the purpose of locating wells.

water-withe, s.

Botany: Vitis caribæa, a species from the West Indies.

water-wood, s.

Bot.: Chimarrhis cymosa.

water-work, s. [WATERWORK.]

water-worm, s.

Zoöl.: A popular name for any of the Naïdæ.

water-worn, adj. Worn by the action of water; especially smoothed by the force or action of running water, or water in motion; as, water-worn pebbles.

water-worship, s.

Compar. Religion: A branch of Nature-worship (q. v.), formerly common among Aryan nations, and still practiced by races of low culture. No race seems to have risen to the abstract conception of water as an element, but seas, rivers, and lakes were all separately worshiped. [HOLY-WELL, LAKE-WORSHIP, RIVER-GOD.]

"Africa displays well the rites of water-worship."—Tylor: Prim. Cult. (ed. 1873), ii. 211.

bōil, bōy; pōut, jōwl; cat, çell, chorus, çhin, bench; go, gem; thin, this; sin, as; expect, Xenophon, exist. ph = f. -cian, -tian = shān. -tion, -sion = shŭn; -tion, -sion = zhŭn. -tious, -cious, -sious = shŭs. -ble, -dle, &c. = bəl, dəl.

water-worshiper, s.

Anthrop.: One who pays divine honors to water. [WATER-WORSHIP.]

"It by no means follows, however, that the savage water-worshippers should necessarily have generalized their ideas, and passed beyond their particular water-deities to arrive at the conception of a general deity presiding over water as an element."—Tylor: Prim. Cult. (ed. 1873), ii. 274.

water-worth, s. An aquavalent (q. v.).

"They are thus arranged according to the number of molecules of attached water, or in what might be called their 'aquavalents,' if this expression were not too symphonious with 'equivalents.' Say, therefore, 'water-worths.'"—Prof. F. Guthrie, in Trans. Phys. Soc., London, pt. ii.

water-wraith, subst. A supposed water-spirit, whose appearance prognosticates death or woe to the person seeing it.

"The water-wraith was shrieking."
Campbell: Lord Ullin's Daughter.

water-yam, s.

Bot.: The Lattice-leaf (q. v.).

wâ-têr, v. t. & i. [A. S. wætrian.] [WATER, s.]

A. Transitive:I. Literally:

1. To irrigate; to overflow with water; to wet with water.

"Thou sowedst thy seed, and wateredst it."—Deuteronomy xi. 10.

II. Fig.: To add stock to that already issued by a company or state, without making any additional provision for the payment of interest on the same. (Comm. Slang.) [WATER, s., II. 2.]

"Those which relate to the betrayal of trusts, the watering of stocks."—Scribner's Magazine, Oct., 1878, p. 896.

B. Intransitive:I. Literally:

1. To shed water or liquid matter.

"If thine eyes can water for his death."
Shakesp.: Henry VI., Pt. III., i. 4.

2. To make water; to void urine.

3. To get or take in water.

"Raleigh having thus landed after he had watered, marched forward with his men."—Camden: Hist. Elizabeth, bk. iv.

*4. To drink; to swallow liquid.

"When you breathe in your watering they cry 'hem!'"—Shakesp.: Henry IV., Pt. I., ii. 4.

5. To gather saliva, as a symptom of appetite; hence, to have a longing desire.

"A Spaniard's mouth so watered."
Shakesp.: Pericles, iv. 2.

II. Fig.: To weaken anything by or as by the addition of water. [A. II.]

"But the Attorney-General . . . interposed with a watering amendment."—London Daily News.

wâ-têr-age (age as ïg), s. [Eng. water; -age.] Money paid for transportation by water.

wâ-têred, pa. par. & a. [WATER, v.]

A. As pa. par.: (See the verb.)

B. As adjective:

1. Ord. Lang.: Wetted with water.

2. Fabric: Applied to stuffs which have been subjected to a process by which the surface assumes a variety of shades, as if the cloth were covered with a multitude of waving and intersecting lines.

wâ-têr-côurse, s. [Eng. water, s., and course.]

I. Ordinary Language:

1. A stream of water; a brook, a river.

2. A channel or canal made for the conveyance of water.

"For scowring the watercourses thorow the cities."
Beaum. & Flet.: Prophetess, iii. 1.

II. Law: A right to the benefit or flow of a river or stream, including that of having the course of the stream kept free from any interruption or disturbance to the prejudice of the proprietor by the acts of persons without his own territory, whether owing to the diversion of the water, or to its obstruction or pollution.

wâ-têr-crëss, s. [Eng. water, s., and cross.]

Bot. & Comm.: Nasturtium officinale, an aquatic plant, having pinnate leaves, with five to seven leaflets, the terminal one being the largest and roundest, all somewhat succulent; petals twice as large as the calyx, white, the pods linear. It is common in brooks and rivulets, flowering from May to October, and is largely used at table as a salad plant. [NASTURTIIUM.]

wâ-têr-ër, s. [Eng. water, v.; -er.] One who or that which waters; one who seeks or procures water.

"The natives kept perpetually harassing our waterers with stones."—Cook: Third Voyage, bk. v., ch. iv.

wâ-têr-fâll, s. [Eng. water, and fall.]

1. A fall or perpendicular descent of the water of a river or stream, or a descent nearly perpendicular; a cascade, a cataract.

"But it is not to list to the waterfall That Parisina leaves her hall."

Byron: Parisina, ii.

¶ A waterfall tends slowly to recede up the stream on which it exists. This retrogression is greatly aided when the strata consists of alternate hard and soft beds dipping up the stream. The running water and the spray soon scoop out the soft beds, leaving the harder ones without adequate support and causing masses of them to fall from time to time. As the waterfall recedes, a gorge is left on the parts of the stream from which it has gradually moved back. The gorge below the falls of Niagara produced by the recession of the great cataract extends seven miles, and must, as Sir Charles Lyell has shown, have required some thousand years for its excavation. A similar gorge on the Rhine, from Bingen to Rolandseck, cut by a now departed waterfall, is sixty miles long. Just beneath the waterfall there is a hole like a "swallow hole." It is often called a kettle. It has a spiral form, and may be four times as deep as wide, or of less proportion. It is excavated by an eddy carrying round pebbles.

"In gaudy-figured satin waistcoat and waterfall of the same material."—Hughes. Tom Brown at Oxford, ch. xxvi.

3. A style of lady's coiffure.

wâ-têr-ï-nëss, s. [Eng. watery; -ness.] The quality or state of being watery.

"Wateriness and turgidity of the eyes."—Arbuthnot.

wâ-têr-îng, pr. par., a. & s. [WATER, v.]

A & B. As pr. par. & particip. adj.: (See the verb.)

C. As substantive:

1. The act of overflowing, sprinkling, or wetting with water

2. The act of supplying with water for drinking or other purposes; the act of getting or taking in water.

"[Bees] near the city walls their wa't'ring take."

Dryden: Virgil; Georgie iv. 282.

3. The act or state of shedding water or liquid matter.

"Applied unto the eyes, for to stay their continuall watering."—P. Holland: Pliny, bk. xxiii., ch. iv.

4. The place where water is supplied or procured; a watering-place.

5. The process of giving a wavy or wave-like appearance to anything; a mode of ornamentation whereby a wave-pattern is produced, or where the article subjected to the process is made to exhibit a wavy luster and different plays of light; specif.:

(1) Fabric: A process (said to have been invented by Octavius May, at Lyons, in the seventeenth century) of giving a wave-like appearance to fabrics, by passing them between metallic rollers variously engraved, which, bearing unequally upon the stuff, render the surface unequal, so as to reflect the light differently.

(2) The wave-like markings so produced.

"Some of these are made in watered silk, the waterings of which are arranged in rather narrow stripes."—London Daily Telegraph.

(3) A similar effect produced on metal, as on a sword-blade, by welding together various qualities of steel.

(4) A similar effect produced in house-painting by wiping the ground with a dry brush, in a flowing or irregular manner, while wet with color.

6. Steeping (q. v.).

watering-call, s.

Mil.: A call or sound of a trumpet on which the cavalry assemble to water their horses.

watering-can, s. A watering-pot (q. v.).

watering-cart, s. A water-cart (q. v.).

watering-place, s.

1. A place where water may be procured, as for cattle, a ship, &c.

"In Australia special water-demons infest pools and watering-places."—Tylor: Prim. Cult. (ed. 1873), ii. 209.

2. A town or place to which people resort at certain seasons, in order to drink mineral waters, or for bathing, as at the seaside.

watering-pot, s. A hand-vessel, with a rose, for sprinkling water on plants and the like; a watering-can, a water-pot.

Watering-pot shell:

Zool.: Any individual of the genus Aspergillum. The minute valves at the extremity of the tube bear some resemblance to the rose of a watering-pot.

watering-trough, s. A trough at which horses or cattle drink.

wâ-têr-îsh, *wat-er-ishe, adj. [Eng. water; -ish.]

I. Literally:

1. Somewhat or rather watery; resembling water; thin as a liquor.

"Fed upon such nice and waterish diet."

Shakesp.: Othello, iii. 3.

2. Moist, damp, humid, wet.

"Not all the dukes of waterish Burgundy."

Shakesp.: Lear, i. 1.

II. Fig.: Weak, insipid, poor.

"The vnsauoury and waterishe lître of Moses lawe."—Udall: John ii.

wâ-têr-îsh-nëss, s. [English waterish; -ness.] The quality or state of being waterish.

"Waterishness, which is like the serosity of our blood."—Floyer.

Wâ-têr-länd-êrg, s. pl. [See def.]

Church Hist.: A name given to the less rigid portion of the Mennonites, because the majority of them belonged to a district called Waterland, in the north of Holland. They are almost exactly similar in their principles to the English Baptists. They are sometimes called Johannites, from Han (=John) de Rys, one of their leaders in the sixteenth century.

wâ-têr-lëss, *wâ-têr-lësse, a. [Eng. water; -less.] Destitute of water; dry.

"The parched earth will be more waterless than ever."—Field, Jan. 21, 1888.

wâ-têr-lôgged, a. [English water; log; -ed.] Lying like a log on the water. (Said of a ship, when by leaking and receiving a great quantity of water into her hold she has become so heavy as to be nearly if not altogether unmanageable, though still keeping afloat.)

wâ-têr-mă-mă, s. [Eng. water, and mamma.]

Anthrop.: A water-spirit (q. v.).

"They have also dreadful stories concerning a horrible beast called the watermamma, which when it happens to take a spite against a canoe, rises out of the river, and, in the most unrelenting manner possible, carries both canoe and Indians down to the bottom with it, and there destroys them."—Waterton: Wanderings, First Journey, ch. i.

wâ-têr-măn, s. [Eng. water, and man.]

I. Ordinary Language:

1. One who manages water-craft; a boatman, a ferryman; one who plies for hire on rivers, &c.

"They ordered the waterman to let fall their oars more gently."—Dryden: Essays; Of Dramatic Poesie.

2. A man who waits at a cab-stand for the purpose of supplying the horses with water, calling the cabmen when absent, and the like, for which he receives a small fee from the men.

"Here yon are, sir," shouted a strange specimen of the human race, in a sackcloth coat, and apron of the same, who, with a brass label and number round his neck, looked as if he were catalogued in some collection of rarities. This was the waterman."—Dickens: Pickwick, ch. ii.

II. Anthrop.: A water-demon.

"In Bohemia, a recent account (1864) says that the fishermen in Bohemia do not venture to snatch a drowning man from the waters. They fear that the waterman (i. e., water-demon) would take away their luck in fishing, and drown themselves at the first opportunity."—Tylor: Prim. Cult. (ed. 1873), i. 109.

waterman's knot, s. A sailor's mode of bending a rope to a post or bollard.

fâte fât, färe, amidst, whât, fâll, father; wê, wêt, hère, camêl, hêr, thêre; pine, pît, sîre, sîr, marîne; gô, pôť, or, wôre, wôlf, wôrk. whô. sôn; mûte, cûb, cûre, unite, cûr, rûle, fûll; trÿ, Sÿrian. æ, œ = ē; ey = ā. qu = kw.

*wâ-têr-man-ship, s. [Eng. waterman; -ship.] The art, skill, or science of managing a boat.

"Watermanship is not acquired in a day."—Field, Dec. 12, 1885.

wâ-têr-proôf, a. & s. [Eng. water, and proof.]

A. As adj.: Impervious to water; so firm and compact as to resist water; as, waterproof cloth, leather, &c. Many solutions and compositions have been employed for the purpose of rendering cloth, &c., waterproof, but india-rubber has now nearly superseded all other agents.

"My waterproof coat did not keep me dry."—Field, April 4, 1885.

B. As subst.: Cloth rendered impervious to water; specif., a coat, cloak, or other article of dress made of such material.

wâ-têr-proôf, v. t. [WATERPROOF, a.]

1. To render impervious to water, as cloth, leather, &c.

2. To dress or wrap in a waterproof.

wâ-têr-proôf-ing, subst. [English waterproof; -ing.]

1. The act or process of rendering waterproof or impervious to water.

2. Any substance, as caoutchouc, a solution of soap and alum, or of isinglass with infusion of galls, for rendering cloth, leather, &c., impervious to water.

wâ-têr-scâpe, s. [Formed from Eng. water, s., on analogy of landscape (q. v.).] A painting representing a scene on a river or lake or at sea.

"The new Associate will send to the Academy a picture representing a Scotch waterscape."—Pall Mall Gazette.

wâ-têr-shêd, subst. [Eng. water, s., and shed.] [SHED (1), s.]

Phys. Geog.: A dividing line, generally formed by a mountain range, running between adjacent rivers, seas, lakes, &c., and representing the limit from which water naturally flows in opposite directions. When a watershed casts its water in more than two directions, it is said to be quaquaversal.

wâ-têr-side, s. [Eng. water, s., and side.] The brink of water; the bank or margin of a river, stream, lake, &c.; the sea-shore.

"He now departed from the waterside in tranquillity."—Goldsmith: Essay 3.

¶ Sometimes used attributively.

wâ-têr-spôut, s. [Eng. water, s., and spout.]

Meteor.: A remarkable phenomenon occurring for the most part at sea, but occasionally on land, though generally in this latter case in the neighborhood of water. A waterspout at sea is usually formed in the following manner: a dense cloud projects from its center a body of vapor, in form something like a sugar-loaf with the point downward. This cone is agitated by the wind until it assumes a spiral form, and gradually dips more and more toward the sea, where a second cone is formed having its point upward. The clouds above and the water below are violently agitated by the physical influences at work. Suddenly the descending and ascending cones of water or vapor meet in mid-air, and form one united pillar which moves onward vertically in calm weather, but obliquely to the horizon when acted on by the wind. The junction of the two cones is generally accompanied by an electric flash. After continuing in this form for a short time the waterspout bursts, in some cases with terrific violence, and to the destruction of anything in the vicinity. Many a ship has been overwhelmed in this manner, and sunk in a moment with all on board. In November, 1855, five vessels were destroyed by a waterspout in the harbor of Tunis. Waterspouts on land are cones or pillars of vapor, descending from the clouds. Land waterspouts are usually very destructive in their effects. On Aug. 30, 1878, the town of Miskolez, in Hungary, was destroyed by a waterspout with considerable loss of life. These phenomena are, however, more common in India than in Europe. One which occurred at Dum-Dum, near Calcutta, was ascertained to be 1,500 feet in height, and it deluged half a square mile of territory to a depth of six inches. The cause of these phenomena has been assumed to be (1) electricity; (2) vortical motion; or (3) a combination of these causes. M. Weyher has, however, succeeded in producing them artificially, and his method shows that vortical motion is the great factor in the production of waterspouts. By means of a rotating tourniquet placed over cold water, an aerial eddy is caused which draws up the water, in the form of a spout composed of drops, to a considerable height; when the water is heated a clearly defined waterspout is seen. With from 1,500 to 2,000 rotations per minute, the vapor from heated water condenses into a visible sheath, enveloping a clearly-defined and rarefied nucleus, conical, and tapering downward. As in natural marine spouts, water-drops are carried up and thrown out beyond the influence of the upward current.

wâ-têr-tight (gh silent), a. [Eng. water, and tight.] So tight as to retain or not to admit water.

"Sufficiently watertight for use without caulking."—Cook: First Voyage, bk. i., ch. xviii.

wâ-têr-wôrk, s. [Eng. water, s., and work, s.]

*1. Cloth painted with water-color, size, or distemper, sometimes used for hangings, instead of tapestry, and for tents.

"For thy walls a pretty slight drollery, or the German hunting in waterwork, is worth a thousand of these bed-hangings, and these fly-bitten tapestries."—Shakesp.: Henry IV., Pt. II., ii. 1.

2. Ornamental wall-painting in which distemper is used. (Weale.)

3. Plural:

(1) A term commonly applied to the aggregate of the constructions and appliances for the collection, preservation, and distribution of water for domestic purposes, for the working of machinery, or the like, for the use of communities.

*2. The structure or structures in which a spout, jet, or shower of water is produced; also, an ornamental fountain or fountains; also, an exhibition or exhibitions of the play of fountains. (Bp. Wilkins.)

(3) The urinary organs (q. v.). (Slang.)

wâ-têr-wôrt, s. [Eng. water, s., and wort.]

Botany:

1. (Sing.): (1) The genus Elatine (q. v.), spec. E. hydropiper; (2) Asplenium trichomanes. (Britten & Holland.)

2. (Pl.): The order Phylodraceæ (q. v.). (Lindley.)

wâ-têr-ÿ, *wa-ter-ie, a. [Eng. water, s.; -ÿ.]

I. Ordinary Language:

1. Of or pertaining to water.

2. Resembling water; thin or transparent, like water.

3. Consisting of water.

"When Phœbe doth behold

Her silver visage in the watery glass."

Shakesp.: Midsummer Night's Dream, i. 1.

4. Filled with water; abounding with water.

"This gross watery pumpkin."

Shakesp.: Merry Wives, iii. 3.

5. Hence, tasteless, insipid, vapid.

"The opinion being that they are more watery when cooked than any other kind."—London Daily Telegraph.

6. Filled with tears; tearful, weeping.

"Her wat'ry eyes

Bent on the earth."

Beaum. & Flét.: Maid's Tragedy, i.

7. Running with any liquid secretion or humor.

"To stay the running and waterie eyes."—P. Holland: Pliny, bk. xxi., ch. xix.

*8. Having a longing or vehement desire; vehemently desiring; watering.

"When that the watery palate tastes indeed Love's thrice repured nectar."

Shakesp.: Troilus and Cressida, iii. 2.

II. Her.: A term sometimes used for Ondé (q. v.).

watery-flounder, s.

Ichthy.: A popular name for the American or Spotted Turbot, Rhombus maculatus. It is from twelve to eighteen inches long, and resembles the Brill more than any other European fish. It occurs along the coast of New England and the middle states, and is excellent eating. (Ripley & Dana.) watery-fusion, s.

Chem.: The dissolving of a salt in its own water of crystallization on heating.

wât-sô'-nî-â, subst. [Named by Miller after his friend, Dr. Wm. Watson, a London apothecary.]

Bot.: A genus of Iridaceæ, closely akin to Gladiolus. The species, which are many, are natives of the Cape of Good Hope. Several are cultivated in greenhouses. Watsonia brevifolia has blossoms of micaceous hue, which glitter in the sun; W. mexicana is also very showy; W. iridifolia is a border plant.

wätt, s. [After James Watt (1736-1819), the celebrated engineer.]

Elect.: (See extract.) [UNIT, II. 3 (2), 4 (7).]

"Dr. Siemens brought forward the proposals contained in his presidential address for some additions to the list of 'practical units' employed by electricians. Two of his units were unanimously approved—namely, (1) the watt, which is the rate of doing work when a current of one ampere passes through a resistance of one ohm. . . . One horse power is equal to 746 watts."—Athenæum, Sept. 2, 1882.

wätte'-vill-ite, s. [After M. V. Watteville, of Paris; suff. -ite (Min.).]

Min.: A mineral occurring in very minute acicular crystals, forming finely fibrous aggregates; crystallization, uncertain; specific gravity, 1.81; color, white; luster, silky. Composition: Essentially a hydrated sulphate of lime, soda, potash, magnesia, yielding the typical formula, $RSO_4 + 2H_2O$ wât'-tle, *wat-el, *wat-le, subst. [A. S. watel, watul, the original sense being something twined or woven together, a hurdle woven with twigs, a bag of woven stuff; hence, the baggy flesh on a bird's neck. (Skeat.)]

I. Ordinary Language:

1. A hurdle made of interwoven rods or wands.

"No hearth the fire, no vent the smoke receives,
The walls are wattles, and the covering leaves."

Scott: Poacher.

2. A rod laid on a roof to support the thatch. (Simmonds.)

3. A twig, a wand. (Scotch.)

"Nae whip nor spur, but just a wattle

O' saugh or hazel."

Burns: Auld Farmer to his Auld Mare.

4. The fleshy lobe that grows under the throat of the domestic fowl, or any appendage of the like kind, as an excrescence about the mouth of some fishes.

"Nor are his comb and his wattles in vain, for they are an ornament becoming his martial spirit."—More: Antidote against Atheism, bk. ii., ch. xi.

II. Bot.: A colonial Australian and Tasmanian name loosely applied to various species of Acacia. Black Wattle is (1) Acacia decurrens, (2) A. mollissima; Green Wattle is also A. decurrens, and Silver Wattle, A. mollissima. The Wattle of Tasmania is A. dealbata. Called also Wattles. [WATTLE-BARK.]

¶ Wattle and daub: The name given to a rough method of constructing cottages. It consists of twigs interwoven and covered with mud or clay.

"Their cottages were of wattle and daub."—Field, March 20, 1886.

wattle-bark, s. The bark of various Australian Acacias, spec. Acacia decurrens, A. melanoxylon, A. dealbata, A. floribunda, and A. affinis. It is largely exported to Europe to be used in dyeing, and the trees are so largely destroyed to furnish it that vast tracts of Acacia forest in Australia are now left bare. A. decurrens is cultivated for its bark in the Neilgherry Hills and some other parts of India; but the ordinary Indian wattle-bark is furnished by A. arabica.

wattle-bird, s.

Ornithology:

1. Meliphaga phrygia (= Anthochaera carunculata). Called also Wattled and Warty-faced Honey-eater. [MELIPHAGA.]

2. The Brush-turkey (q. v.).

wattle-crow, s.

Ornith. (pl.): Swainson's name for the Glauco-pinæ (q. v.).

wattle-turkey, s.

Ornith.: The Brush-turkey (q. v.).

wattle-wood, s.

Bot.: Lætia thamnia.

wattle-work, s. Wicker-work.

"The huts were probably more generally made of wattle-work, like those of the Swiss lakes."—Dawkins: Early Man in Britain, ch. viii.

wât'-tle, *wat-el-en, v. t. [WATTLE, s.]

1. To bind with twigs.

"And watelde hit and wallyde hit."

Piers Ploughman, p. 383.

2. To twist, to interweave, to interlace, to plait; to form into a kind of net-work with flexible branches.

"The sides and top of the house are filled up with boughs coarsely wattled between the poles."—Dampier: Voyages (an. 1691).

3. To form by interwoven twigs.

"His wattled cotes the shepherd plants."

Warton: Ode on the Approach of Spring.

wât'-tled (le as el), a. [Eng. wattl(e); -ed.]

1. Ord. Lang. & Zool.: Furnished with wattles. [WATTLE, s., I. 4.]

"The wattled cocks strut to and fro."

Longfellow: The Wayside Inn. (Prelude.)

2. Bot.: Having processes like the wattles of a cock, as Rhinanthus alectrolophus.

wattled and combed, a.

Her.: Said of a cock, when the gills and comb are borne of a different tincture from that of the body.

wattled bird of paradise, s.

Ornith.: Paradigalla carunculata, from New Guinea.

wattled honey-eater, s. [WATTLE-BIRD.]

bôll, bôÿ; pôut, jôwl; cat, çell, chorus, çhin, bench; go, gem; thin, ðhis; sin, aş; expect, Xenophon, exist. ph = f.
-cian, -tian = şan. -tion, -sion = şhñ; -þion, -şion = zhñ. -tious, -cious, -sious = şhş. -ble, -dle, &c. = beł, deł.

wāt-tlīng, *wāt-līng, subst. [Eng. wattl(e); -ing.]

1. The act of plaiting or interweaving boughs or twigs together.
2. The framework so formed.

"Made with a watling of canes or sticks."—Dampier: Voyages (an. 1688).

wāu'-ble, v. i. [WOBBLE.] To swing, to reel. (Scotch.)

"An' ran them till they a' did wauble."

Burns: Auld Farmer to his Auld Mare.

wāuch, wāugh (ch, gh guttural), a. [Cf. Icel. valgr=lukewarm; A. S. wealg.] Unpleasant to the taste or smell; nauseous, bad, worthless.

wāucht, wāught (ch, gh guttural), s. [A variant of quaght, itself a variant of quaff.] A large draught of any liquid. (Scotch.)

"To gie them a waught o' drink and a bannock."—Scott: Old Mortality, ch. iv.

wāuf, wāuff, s. [WAVE.] A wave, a flap.

"Deil a wauff of his coat-tail could I see."—Scott: Heart of Mid-Lothian, ch. li.

wāuk'-rife, adj. [Scotch wauk=wake; -rife.] Wakeful.

"Wail through the dreary midnight hour

Till waukrife morn!"

Burns: Elegy on Captain Henderson.

wāul (1), v. i. [From the sound made.] To cry as a cat; to squall.

wāul (2), v. i. [WAWL (2).]

wāur, a. [See def.] Worse. (Scotch.)

"'Vanity and waur!' said the Dominie."—Scott: Guy Mannering, ch. v.

wāur, v. t. [WAUR, a.] To overcome, to worst. (Scotch.)

"Was like to be waured afore the session for want of a paper."—Scott: Antiquity, ch. ix.

wāu'-rē-gān, a. [American Indian wunnegan= fine, gaudy.] Gaudy, showy, flashy. (U. S. Colloq.)

wāve, s. [WAVE, v.]

I. Ordinary Language:

1. In the same sense as II.

"He that wavereth is like a wave of the sea driven with the wind and tossed."—James i. 6.

2. Anything resembling a wave in character or appearance; as—

(1) One of a series of undulating inequalities on a surface; an undulation; a swelling outline.

"Without whose numberless waves or curls, which usually arise from the sand-holes a little smoothed in polishing with putty."—Newton.

(2) The undulating streak or line of luster on cloth, watered and calendered.

(3) Anything which advances and recedes, rises and falls, comes and goes, or increases and diminishes with some degree of regular recurrence, like a wave; as, a wave of prejudice, a wave of popularity, &c.

3. Water. (Poetical.)

"By the salt wave of the Mediterranean."

Shakesp.: Love's Labor's Lost, v. 1.

*4. A throng of people borne along together. (Shakesp.: Cymbeline, v. 3.)

5. A waving or undulating motion; a signal made by waving the hand, a flag, or the like.

II. Physics: An undulation; a movement which, though it seems progressive, is in reality only up and down, or, to a certain extent, to and fro, though it is transmitted to a distance by the fact that at each successive point the otherwise similar motion of a single particle takes place a little later in time—the time which it takes for the motion to be communicated from the preceding moving particle. Waves exist in water, in air (sound-waves), in ether (light-waves), &c. [SOUND, UNDULATORY-THEORY.] A wave upon the open ocean alternately rises into a ridge and sinks into a depression (the trough of the sea). Anything floating, say a quantity of sargasso sea-weed, rises on a billow and sinks again as the wave falls, without otherwise changing its place. Even the undulatory movement affects the water only to a few feet in depth, where, unless there are submarine currents, all is still. When a wave comes inshore and enters a narrow gulf, it becomes affected both by the return of the reflex waves from its sides and the friction of the bottom, if the water be shallow, so that instead of a movement mainly up and down, it now becomes progressive, and breaks in a series of billows on the sands or rocks. In the former case the water runs up the sand, and then recedes considerably before the next wave comes in. Sea waves are mainly caused by the wind. If a breeze blowing off the shore cause ripples near the land, these will rise higher the farther they are from the shore if the cause which brought them into being continues to operate. Out on the open ocean they rise to some feet in elevation, but it is a great exaggeration to call them "mountains high"; they have, however, been witnessed approximately sixty feet from trough to summit in the Atlantic. When they rise into a sharp ridge, and the wind is strong, they crest over, break, and fall on the leeward side with abundant spray; but this does not occur on the ocean to the same extent as near shore. The force of waves is so great that, geologically viewed, they are a potent force in altering the conformation of coasts. When in a storm they break with transcendent force on a shore they scoop out soft shales into caves, allowing the harder rocks above in time to fall in, or they break off portions of those harder rocks themselves, besides grinding against each other any fallen slabs which may already be lying on the beach.

wave-borne, a. Borne or carried on or by the waves.

wave-breast, s.

Judaism: The breast of an animal which has been offered in sacrifice used as a wave-offering (q. v.).

wave-length, subst. The distance between the crests of two adjacent waves, or between the lowest parts of the depressions on each side of a wave.

wave-line principle, s.

Ship-build.: The principle of building ships with contours scientifically adapted to the curves of the sea-waves they have to traverse. It was introduced by Mr. Scott Russell in consequence of experiments made by him in 1834. The principle is now generally adopted.

wave-loaf, s.

Judaism: A loaf for a wave-offering (q. v.).

wave-moths, s.

Entom.: The Acidaliidæ, a family of Geometer Moths.

wave-motion, s. Motion in curves alternately concave and convex, like that of the waves of the sea; undulatory motion.

wave-offering, s.

Judaism: Heb. tenuphah=agitation, tumult, a wave-offering, from nuph=to agitate, to wave. An offering which is believed by the Rabbis to have been waved to the four points of the compass, "before the Lord," as an acknowledgment of his sovereignty over the earth. It is often combined with the similar heave-offering, believed to have been waved upward as an acknowledgment of his rule over heaven. It is connected also with the peace-offering, of which it, as a rule, constituted a part. When an animal was presented in sacrifice, the shoulder was often offered as a heave-offering and the breast as wave-offering. [WAVE-BREAST.] Both afterward became the perquisites of the priests. On the second day of the Passover a sheaf was waved. At Pentecost two lambs of the first year were to be offered as a peace-offering, and both were to be waved (Lev. x. 14, xxiii. 11-15, 20; Numb. vi. 20, xviii. 11.)

"And waved them for a wave-offering before the Lord."—Lev. viii. 27.

Physics: Any radial line along which an earthquake is propagated from its origin. [SEISMIC-CENTER.]

wave-shell, s.

Physics: One of the waves of alternate compression and expansion, propagated during an earthquake in all directions from the seismic center to the earth's surface. Theoretically these should have the form of concentric shells; but, as the earth's crust is made up of rocks varying greatly in density and elasticity, the waves will necessarily have greater velocity in one direction than in another, while the transit of the wave may be interrupted by breach of continuity in the transmitting medium. (Encyc. Brit.) wave-trap, s.

Hydr. Eng.: A widening inward of the sides of piers, to afford space for storm-waves which roll in at the entrance to spread and extend themselves.

wave-wine, s.

Bot.: Convolvulus, or Calystegia sepium, and Convolvulus arvensis. (Britten & Holland.) wave-worn, a. Worn by the waves.

"The wave-worn horns of the echoing bank."

Tennyson: Dying Swan, 39.

wāve (1), v. i. & t. [A. S. waflan; cogn. with O. Icel. vafa, vafra, vafra=to waver; vajl=hesitation; vāfa, vōfa, vafa=to swing, to vibrate; M. H. Ger. waben=to wave; waberen, wabelen, webelen=to fluctuate.]

A. Intransitive:

1. To be moved loosely one way and the other; to play loosely; to float, to flutter.

"Those fotemen . . . saw the baners and standerdes wave with the wynde."—Berners: Froissart; Cronycle, vol. i., ch. ciii.

- †2. To be moved as a signal; to beckon.

- †3. To waver; to be in an unsettled state; to hesitate, to fluctuate.

"He waved indifferently betwixt doing them neither good nor harm."—Shakesp.: Coriolanus, ii. 2.

B. Transitive:

1. To move one way and the other; to move to and fro; to brandish.

"King Helenus wav'd high the Thracian blade."

Pope: Homer's Iliad, xiii. 728.

11. Right of way:

Law: A privilege which an individual or a particular description of individuals may have of going over another's grounds, subject to certain conditions or sanctioned by the custom by virtue of which the right exists. A right of way may be claimed by prescription and immemorial usage, such right being absolute and indefeasible if proved to be used down to the time of the commencement of the action. It may also be granted by special permission, as when the owner of lands grants to another liberty of passing over his grounds in order to go to church, market, or the like, in which case the gift is confined to the grantee alone, and dies with him. Again, a right of way may arise by act and operation of law, as when a man grants a piece of ground in the middle of his field he at the same time tacitly and impliedly grants a way to come at it.

¶ When works of public utility, such as railroads, are to be constructed the law of most states will compel the conveyance to the corporation of a right of way upon tender of fair value to the owner of land.

12. To give way: [GIVE, ¶ 23.]

13. To go one's way (or ways): To take one's departure; to depart; to go off. (Often used as implying reproach.)

3. An annual dinner of the persons employed in an English printing-office; a printer's bean-feast. Timperley (Dict. Printers & Printing, p. 516) says: "The derivation of this term is not generally known. It is from the old English word wayz = stubble. A stubble-goose is a known dainty in our days. A wayz-goose was the head dish at the annual feast of the forefathers of our fraternity."

wē, pers. pron. [A. S.; cogn. with Dut. wij; Icel. vér, var; Dan. & Sw. vi; Ger. wir; Goth. weis.] The plural of the first personal pronoun: I and another, or others; I and he or she, or I and they.

¶ 1. We is often used indefinitely, or vaguely, like they, in the sense of people generally, the world, &c., and corresponding to the French on and the German man. In this use we differs from they in that by using it the speaker identifies himself more or less directly with the statement, whereas the use of they does not imply any such identification.

2. We is frequently used by individuals, as editors, authors, and the like, when alluding to themselves, in order to avoid any appearance of egotism, which would arise from the too constant use of the pronoun I. We is also used by kings and other potentates in official documents. It is said to have been first so used by King John, of England (1204-15).

"We charge you, on allegiance to ourself,

To hold your slaughtering hands."

Shakesp.: Henry VI., Pt. I., iii. 1.

wēak, weake, walk, weik, weke, wycke, wyke, a. [Icel. veikr, vekr, vákr = weak; Sw. vek; Dan. veg = pliant; A. S. wác = pliant, weak, easily bent; Dut. week; Ger. weich.] The original meaning was yielding, giving way easily; cf. Icel. vikja (pa. t. veik, pa. par. vikinn) = to turn, to turn aside; A. S. wican (pa. t. wác, pa. par. wicen) = to give way; Ger. weichen (pa. t. wich, pa. par. gewichen) = to give way; Gr. eikō, for veikō = to yield, to give way. From the same root come wick and wicker.]

† As a proper name it is applied to a valley or tract of English country lying between the north and south downs of Kent and Sussex.

Weald-clay, s.

Geol.: The upper stratum or series of strata of the British Wealden formation. It is about 1,000 feet thick, and, with the exception of its upper portion, which is fluvio-marine, is of fresh-water origin. It constituted the delta of a great river, which slowly subsided till at length the ocean was let in. The delta was inhabited by great Saurians, of the genera Iguanodon, Hypsilophodon, Pelorosaurus, Ornithopsis, and Hylæosaurus. These, becoming submerged as the delta sank, became imbedded, not in the Weald clay, but in the overlying Kentish Rag which succeeded the clay, and rests on it conformably. Throughout the clay itself are casts of Cyprides, and there are occasional bands of Sussex marble composed almost entirely of a species of Paludina. The Weald clay constitutes a valley between the elevated ridges of the Hastings Sand and the chalk downs of Kent, Surrey, Hampshire, and Sussex, from Hythe by Tunbridge, Harting-combe, and Hailsham to Pevensy.

Wēald'-en, a. & s. [Eng. wēald; -en.]

A. As adj.: Of or pertaining to a weald; specifically, pertaining to the weald of Kent and Sussex, England, or to the formation described under B.

B. As substantive:

Geol.: A formation or group of rocks consisting of clay, shale, sand, sandstones, grits, and lime-stones, constituting the lowest part of the Cretaceous system. In 1822 Mr. Gideon Algernon Mantell (afterward Dr. Mantell, F. R. S.) correctly showed that it was of fluvial origin, though intercalated between marine Oolite below, and Greensand, also marine, above. The name, Wealden Formation, was first introduced by Mantell, to whom it had been suggested by his friend J. P. Martin, Esq., of Pulborough. The Wealden has been generally divided into the Weald Clay, constituting the upper beds, the Hastings Sand in the middle, and Purbeck beds below; but the Purbeck beds are now considered to be Oolite, or to be intermediate between the Oolite and the Wealden. The thickness of the true Wealden formation in Swanage Bay, where it is most highly developed, may be 2,000 feet. Its fauna consists of great reptiles, fishes of the genus Lepidotus, and freshwater mollusks, Physa, Limnæa, &c.; its flora of Conifers, Cycads, and Ferns, but no Dicotyledonous Angiosperms. The delta of the old Wealden river has been traced about two hundred miles from east to west, and a hundred miles from north to south. Much has been swept away by denudation. The Quorra or Niger in Africa covers 25,000 square miles; the Wealden river therefore probably approached, and may possibly have exceeded it in magnitude. It drained a large part of a continent, the area and exact situation of which are unknown. The Wealden of Hanover and Westphalia constitutes the delta of a second river distinct from the first. [WEALD-CLAY, HASTINGS-SAND, PURBECK-BEDS.]

wēald'-ish, adj. [English wēald; -ish.] Of or belonging to a weald, and especially to the weald of Kent and Sussex, England.

"The wēaldish man."—Fuller: Worthies; Kent.

wēal'-fūl, wēale-full, a. [Eng. wēal (1), and full.] Happy.

"To telle the jerkes with joy, that joy do bring,

Is both a wēalefull and a wofull thing."

Davies: Holy Roode, p. 13.

wēalth, wēalthē, welthe, s. [Eng. wēal (1), s.; -th; cf. health, from heal, dearth, from dear, &c.; cogn. with Dut. wēelde=luxury, from wel=well (adv.).]

I. Ordinary Language:

*1. Weal, prosperity, welfare, eternal happiness.

"Let no man seek his own, but every man another's wēalth."—1 Corinth. x. 24.

2. A collective term for riches; material possessions in all their variety; large possessions of money, goods, or lands; that abundance of worldly estate which exceeds the state of the greater part of the community; affluence, opulence.

"That wēalth consists in money or in gold and silver, is a popular notion."—Smith: Wealth of Nations, bk. iv., ch. i.

3. Abundance, affluence, profusion.

"With new wonder now he views . . .

In narrow room nature's whole wēalth, yea more,
A heav'n on earth." Milton: P. L., iv. 207.

II. Polit. Econ.: A term embracing all and only such objects as have utility and can be appropriated in exclusive possession, and therefore exchanged. Political economists consider labor as the only source of wēalth, and political economy treats mainly of the means of promoting the increase of national wēalth, and of removing obstructions to its development.

wēalth'-fūl, wēalth'-fūll, a. [Eng. wealthy; -ful (1).] Full of wēalth or happiness; prosperous.

"Likelie righte wel to prosper in wēalthfull place."—More: Works, p. 39.

wēalth'-fūl-lȳ, adv. [Eng. wealthful; -ly.] In prosperity or happiness; prosperously.

"To lead thy life wealthfully."—Vives: Instruct. of a Christian Woman, bk. ii., ch. ii.

wēalth'-ī-lȳ, adv. [Eng. wealthy; -ly.] In a wēalth manner; in the midst of wēalth or riches; richly.

I. Literally:

1. Zoöl.: The genus Putorius; specif., Putorius vulgaris, the Common Weasel. Length about twelve inches, of which the tail occupies nearly a quarter. Body extremely slender and arched; head small and flattened, eyes black and remarkably quick and lively, ears short and rounded; the neck is long, being but little shorter than the trunk and very flexible; tail short, and without a terminal tuft of hair; legs short and furred to end of toes. Upper part light reddish-brown, under surface quite white. It feeds on mice and rats, moles and small birds, and, according to Bell (British Quadrupeds, p. 183), it would appear that this animal ought rather to be fostered as a destroyer of vermin than extirpated as a noxious depredator. Occasionally the weasel becomes white in winter, though the tail always retains its reddish tinge, as that of the Ermine does its black tip. In this white stage the Weasel is the Mustela nivalis of Linnæus.

*2. Ornith.: A bird which Browne calls Mustela variegata. Probably the Smew (q. v.); Mergus albellus, the M. mustelaris of Gesner.

"Divers other sorts of dive-fowl . . . the variegated or partly-colored weasel, so called from the resemblance it beareth unto a weasel in the head."—Browne: Birds of Norfolk.

*II. Fig.: A lean, mean, sneaking fellow.

"The weasel Scot

Comes sneaking."

"They waxed weasy and fatte, as saith the song of Moses."—Joye: Expos. of Daniel, ch. iv.

wëaþ'-ër, *wed-er, *wed-re, *wed-yr, s. & a. [A. S. weder; cogn. with Dut. weder; Icel. vedhr; Dan. veir; Sw. väder; O. H. Ger. wetar; Ger. wetter=weather; gewitter=a storm; cf. Icel. land-vidhri=a land-wind; heidh-vidhri=bright weather; Lith. wëtra=a storm, stormy weather; Russ. vieter, vietr=wind, breeze. From the same root as WIND (1), s.]

A. As substantive:

I. Ordinary Language:

1. A general term for the atmospheric conditions, or the state of the air, with special reference to the questions of cold or heat, pressure, dryness, humidity, presence or absence of rain, occurrence of sunshine, or any other meteorological phenomena; as warm weather, dry weather, wet weather, stormy weather, hazy weather, &c. The science which investigates the causes of these changes of the atmosphere, and attempts to trace them to their origin is called Meteorology (q. v.).

"When the wind is thus settled, we have commonly fair weather."—Dampier: Discourse of Winds, ch. i.

¶ In some tropical countries the seasons are so regular that the weather for any particular month may be predicted long beforehand without any considerable liability to error. For instance, it may safely be said that from November 1 to June 1 in Central India there will be only two or three rainy days, while between June 15 and September 15 there will be few days that are not rainy. [MONSOON, SEASON.] Prediction in any particular year in temperate climates is much more liable to error, though on a series of years there is tolerable uniformity, so that such expressions have arisen as March winds, April showers, and November fogs. The popular belief that the weather can be predicted by noting the changes of the moon is erroneous. Most other popular notions regarding weather signs are more or less accurate. In predicting the weather in Great Britain the meteorologists labor under this great disadvantage, that the approach, say, of a depression from the Atlantic, the ordinary precursor of a storm, cannot be telegraphed till it has reached the west coast of Ireland. If, on the contrary, a storm crossing this country from the southwest be moving toward New York, its progress can be telegraphed to that city whenever it reaches the Pacific shores of the continent.

*2. Change of the state of the air.

*3. Hence, fig., vicissitude, change of condition.

"An ancient family, which have stood against the waves and weathers of time."—Bacon.

*4. A light rain, a shower. (Wycliffe: Deuteronomy xxxii. 2.)

*5. Wind.

*6. A storm, a tempest.

"Roaring louder than the sea or weather."

Shakesp.: Winter's Tale, iii. 3.

*7. Bad, wet, or inclement weather.

"Seynge this bysshop with his company syttyng in the weder."—Fabyan: Chronycle, ch. lxxxi.

8. The inclination or obliquity of the sails of a windmill to the plane of revolution.

II. Naut.: The side of the vessel exposed to the wind; in contradistinction to the lee or leeward side, which is away from the wind.

B. As adjective:

Nautical: Toward the wind; windward. (Used frequently in composition: as, weather-quarter, weather-gauge, &c.)

¶ (1) To make fair weather: To flatter; to conciliate by fair words and a show of friendship. [FAIR-WEATHER, 2.]

"I must make fair weather yet awhile."

Shakesp.: Henry VI., Pt. II., v. 1.

(2) To make good (or bad) weather:

Naut.: To behave well (or ill) in a storm; to ship little (or much) water.

weather-anchor, s.

Naut.: The anchor lying to windward, by which the ship rides when moored.

weather-beaten, a. Beaten by the wind; seasoned by exposure to all sorts of weather.

¶ It is probable that weather-beaten should really be weather-bitten (q. v.). In some cases it is undoubtedly a corruption of the latter word: as in Shakesp.: Winter's Tale, v. 2:

"Like a weather-bitten conduit."

Weather Bureau, s. A bureau of the Department of Agriculture. It has charge of the weather signal service.

weather-bit, *weather-bitten, a. [Cf. Sw. väderbiten=weather-bitten; Norw. vederbiten.] Bitten, nipped, or frozen by the weather. [WEATHER-BEATEN.]

weather-blown, a. Weather-beaten; exposed.

"Strong Enispe that for height is weather-blown."

Chapman: Homer's Iliad, ii. 532.

weather-board, v. t. To nail boards upon, as on a roof or side of a house, lapping one over another, in order to prevent rain, snow, &c., from penetrating it.

weather-board, s.

1. Nautical:

(1) That side of a ship which is toward the wind; the windward side.

(2) A piece of plank placed in the ports of a ship when laid up in ordinary, and serving as a protection from bad weather. They are fixed in an inclined position, so as to turn off the rain without preventing the circulation of air.

2. Build. (pl.): Weather-boarding (q. v.)

weather-board-ing, s. Boards nailed with a lap on each other to prevent the penetration of rain, snow, &c., as on roofs, the sides of houses, &c.

weather-boarding gauge, s. [BOARDING-GAUGE.]

weather-bound, a. Delayed or restrained from sailing by bad weather.

weather-bow, s.

Naut.: The side of a ship's bow that is to windward.

weather-box, s. A kind of hygrometer, usually in the shape of a toy house, in which certain mechanical results from the weight or fixture of materials due to dampness are made to move a figure or pair of figures—a man and a woman on a poised arm, for instance, so that the former advances from his porch in wet, and the latter in dry weather.

weather-breeder, s.

1. A distant, but approaching cloud. (U. S. Collog.)

2. A fine day which is supposed to presage foul weather. (Prov. Eng.) weather-cloth, s.

Naut.: A long piece of canvas or tarpauling used to preserve the hammocks from injury by the weather, when stowed, or to defend persons from the wind and spray.

weather-cock, s. & v. [WEATHERCOCK.]

weather-driven, a. Driven by winds or storms; forced by stress of weather.

"Philip, during his voyage towards Spain, was weather-driven into Weymouth."—Carew: Survey of Cornwall.

weather-eye, s. The eye that looks at the sky to forecast the weather.

¶ To keep one's weather-eye open (or awake): To be sharply on one's guard; to have or keep one's wits about one. (Slang.) weather-fend, v. t. To defend or shelter from the weather.

"The lime-grove, which weather-fends your cell."

Shakesp.: Tempest, v. 1.

House, with Weather-boards.

fâte, fât, färe, amidst, whât, fâll, father; wë, wët, hère, camêl, hêr, thêre; pine, pît, sîre, sîr, marîne; gô, pôt, or, wôre, wôlf, wôrk, whô, sôn; mûte, cûb, cûre, unite, cûr, râle, fûll; trÿ, Sÿrian. æ, œ = ē; ey = ā. qu = kw.

weather-fish, s.

Ichthy.: Misgurnus fossilis, called also the Mud-fish and Thunder-fish. It is about a foot in length, dark-brown above, flecked with black; abdomen orange, with black spots. In Germany and Austria it is regarded as a weather-prophet, because it usually comes to the surface about twenty-four hours before bad weather, and moves about with unusual energy. This habit has sometimes led to its being confined in a glass globe as an animated barometer. (Seeley: Freshwater Fishes of Europe.)

weather-gage, s. [WEATHER-GAUGE.]

weather-gall, s. The same as WATER-GALL (q. v.).

weather-gauge, weather-gage, s.

1. Lit. & Naut.: The advantage of the wind; specifically the position or station of one ship to the windward of another.

"Take a turn round the back o' the hill to gain the wind on them; and when thou'st got the weather-gage thou mayst drive them before thee as gently as so many innocent lambs."—Scott: Ivanhoe, ch. i.

*2. Fig.: Advantage of position; superiority, vantage.

"Were the line
Of Rokeby once combined with mine,
I gain the weather-gage of fate!"

Scott: Rokeby, vi. 24.

weather-gaw, s. [WEATHER-GALL.]weather-glass, s.

Physics: A popular name for a barometer (q. v.), the weather indications of which are often graduated thus:

Height.	State of the weather.
31 inches.....	Very dry.
30½ ".....	Settled weather.
30 ".....	Fine weather.
30 ".....	Variable.
29½ ".....	Rain or wind.
29½ ".....	Much rain.
29 ".....	Tempest.

weather-gleam, s. A peculiar clear sky near the horizon. (Prov.)

"You have marked the lighting of the sky just above the horizon when clouds are about to break up and disappear. Whatever name you gave it you would hardly improve on that of the weather-gleam, which in some of our dialects it bears."—Trench: English Past and Present, lect. 5.

weather-hardened, a. Weather-beaten; seasoned by exposure to the weather.

"A countenance weather-hardened as it was."—Southey: Doctor, ch. ix.

†weather-harp, s. A large Æolian harp. (Ros-siter.)

weather-headed, a. Having a sheepish look. (Scotch.)

"That old weather-headed fool."—Congreve: Love for Love, ii. 7.

¶ Probably a corruption of wether-headed.

weather-helm, s.

Naut.: A ship is said to carry a weather-helm when, owing to her having a tendency to gripe, the helm requires to be kept a little to windward, or a-weather, in order to prevent her head from coming up in the wind when sailing close-hauled.

weather-house, subst. A weather-box (q. v.). (Cowper: Task, i. 211.)

weather-line, s. The line where the trunk of a tree touches and rises above the soil, and is thus exposed to the weather.

"The weather-line, just by the surface of the earth, where the durability of timber is put to the severest test."—Mudie: Pop. Guide to the Obs. of Nature.

weather-moldings, s. pl.

Arch.: Drip-stones or canopies over a door, intended to throw off the rain.

weather-proof, a. Proof against the weather; able to afford adequate protection against a tempest or to pass through one uninjured.

"Our bark's not weather-proof."—Quarles: History of Jonah, E. i. b.

weather-prophet, s. One who foretells coming weather; one who is weather-wise.

weather-quarter, s.

Nautical: The quarter of a ship which is on the windward side.

weather-roll, s.

Naut.: The roll of a ship to the windward in a heavy sea, upon the beams. (Opposed to lee-lurch.) weather-shore, s.

Nautical: The shore which lies to windward of a ship.

weather-side, s.

Naut.: That side of a ship under sail upon which the wind blows, or which is to windward.

weather-signal, s. A signal for indicating weather conditions. Five flags are used by the U. S. Weather Bureau to indicate the temperature and ordinary conditions of the weather. They are numbered 1 to 5, but some are used in couples to form combinations. No. 1 is a perfect white square and indicates "clear or fair weather." No. 2 is all blue, also square, and its meaning is "rain or snow." No. 3 is a black triangle and is called the "temperature signal." It is always used in combination with either the white or blue square. When placed above the white or blue flag it means that the weather will be warmer, and when below, that it will be colder. When it is omitted altogether, the significance is that the temperature will be stationary. Sometimes three flags are used in combination. For example, when the triangular flag is at the top of the pole, with the white square immediately below it, and the blue square below the white, the signal reads "warmer, fair weather, followed by rain or snow." No. 4 is the "cold wave" signal. It is a white square with a black square in the center of the white. It shows up very clearly, and can never be mistaken for anything else. No. 5 indicates "local rains or showers." It is a square flag, of which the upper half is white and the lower blue. [STORM SIGNAL.]

weather-spy, s. An astrologer; one who foretells the weather; a weather prophet.

"A gulling weather-spy."—Donne: Satire i.

weather-stain, s. A stain or mark caused by exposure to the weather.

weather-strip, s. A piece of board, rubber, or the like, which closes accurately the space between the shut door and the threshold.

weather-tide, s.

Naut.: The tide which sets against the leeside of a ship, impelling her to windward.

weather-tiling, s.

Build.: Tiling placed in a vertical position on the side of a house.

weather-vane, s. A vane; a weather-cock.

weather-wind, s.

Bot.: Convolvulus sepium.

weather-wise, a. Wise or skillful in foreseeing or predicting changes of the weather.

"After I perceived them to be weather-wise."—Hackluyt: Voyages, i. 281.

weather-wiser, s. Something which predicts or foreshows the weather.

"The flowers of pimpernel, the opening and shutting of which are the countryman's weather-wiser."—Derham: Physico-Theol., bk. x.

weather-worn, a. Worn by the action of or by exposure to the weather; weathered.

weather-wrack, s. Something damaged by exposure to the weather.

wēath'-ēr-cōck, v. t. & i. [WEATHER, s.]A. Transitive:*I. Ordinary Language:

*1. To air; to expose to the air.

2. To bear up against and overcome, as danger or difficulty; to sustain the effects of or pass through without permanent injury or loss; as, to weather difficulties.

II. Technically:

1. Geol.: To cause to alter in color, coherence, or composition, and to decay through the influence of the weather. (Spec. in the pa. and pr. par.) [WEATHERED, II. 2., WEATHERING, II. 2.]

2. Nautical:

(1) To sail to the windward of; to pass to windward.

(2) To bear up against and come through, though with difficulty. (Said of a ship in a storm, as also of a captain or pilot.)

B. Intransitive:

Geol.: To undergo alteration tending to decomposition, to decay by the action of the weather.

¶ 1. To weather a point:

(1) Naut.: To gain a point toward the wind, as a ship.

(2) Fig.: To gain or accomplish a point against opposition.

2. To weather out: To endure; to hold out to the end against.

wēath'-ēr-cōck, *wed-yr-cok, subst. [English weather, and cock, s.]

1. Lit.: A vane; a weather-vane; a figure placed on the top of a spire, steeple, roof, or the like, which turns with the wind, and shows its direction. So called because the figure of a cock, as an emblem of vigilance, was a favorite form of vane.

2. Fig.: Any person or thing that turns easily and frequently; a fickle, inconstant person.

"Where had you this pretty weathercock?" "I cannot tell what the dickens his name is my husband had him of."—Shakesp.: Merry Wives, iii. 2.

wēath'-ēr-cōck, v. t. [WEATHERCOCK, s.] To serve as a weathercock to or upon.

"Whose blazing wyvern weathercocked the spire."

Tennyson: Aymer's Field, 17.

wēath'-ēred, a. [Eng. weather; -ed.]

I. Ord. Language: Seasoned by exposure to the weather; weather-beaten.

II. Technically:

1. Arch.: Applied to surfaces which have a small slope or inclination given to them to prevent water lodging on them, as window-sills, the tops of classic cornices, and the upper surface of most flat stone-work.

"So much of the outer surface as protrudes from the wall is weathered, or sloped off to carry the water away."—Cassell's Technical Educator, pt. xi., p. 294.

2. Geol.: Altered and more or less decomposed, disintegrated, or decayed through the operation of the weather.

wēath'-ēr-īng, *wed-er-yng, subst. [English weather; -ing.]

I. Ord. Lang.: Weather.

"Which would haue bene, with the weathering which we had, ten or twelve dayes worke."—Hackluyt: Voyages, iii. 515.

II. Technically:

1. Arch.: The act of giving an inclination, or the inclination given to a surface so as to enable it to throw off water.

2. Geol.: The disintegration and decay of rocks under the influence of the weather. The alternations of heat and cold often make rocks brittle. The freezing of water within their interstices also has a destructive effect. When rocks are composed of two or more minerals, which expand differently when heated, and contract differently when they become cold, a powerful destructive agency is established. The carbon dioxide of the air acts on rocks containing lime, and rain and wind remove the bicarbonate. Wind also at times raises sand, which scours the rocks and somewhat wastes them away. (Lyell.)

wēath'-ēr-lī-nēss, s. [Eng. weatherly; -ness.]

Naut.: The quality or state of being weatherly.

"The properties in a yacht which govern speed or weatherliness."—Field, April 4, 1885.

wēath'-ēr-lŷ, a. [Eng. weather; -ly.]

Naut.: Applied to a ship when she holds a good wind; that is, when she presents so great a lateral resistance to the water, when close-hauled, that she makes very little leeway.

"It was considered desirable she should possess more weatherly power."—Field, Feb. 11, 1888.

wēath'-ēr-mōst, a. [Eng. weather; -most.]

Naut.: Being furthest to the windward.

"The weathermost portion of the sail exercises very little power on the ship."—Field, Feb. 25, 1888.

wēath'-ēr-ōl'-ō-gŷ, s. [Eng. weather; -ology.]

A humorously coined word to express the science of the weather. (Byron.) wēave (1), weve (pa. t. waf*, weaved*, wove, pa. par. weaved*, woven, wovun*), v. t. & i. [A. S. wefan (pa. t. waf, pa. par. wefen); cogn. with Dut. weven; Icel. vefa (pa. t. vaf, pa. par. ofinn); Dan. være; Sw. vefva; Ger. weben (pa. t. wob, pa. par. gewoben); Sansc. vā, ve, vap.]

A. Transitive:

1. To form by the interlacing of anything flexible, such as threads, yarns, filaments, or strips of different materials; to form by texture, or by the insertion and interlacing of one part of a material within another.

"The women wove hangings for the grove."—2 Kings xiii. 7.

2. To form a texture with; to interlace or intertwine so as to form a fabric.

"When she waved the sleided silk."

Shakesp.: Pericles, iv. (Chorus.)

3. To entwine; to unite by intermixture or close connection; to unite closely or intimately.

"Those [notions] which are supposed woven into the very principles of their being."—Locke: Human Understand., bk. i., ch. ii.

*4. To contrive, fabricate, or construct with design or elaborate care; as, to weave a plot.

B. Intransitive:I. Ordinary Language:

1. To practice weaving; to work with a loom.

"Whether they be . . . spinning, weaving, sowing, or brushing."—Vives: Instruct. of a Christian Woman, bk. ii., ch. x.

bōl, bōy; pōut, jōwl; cat, çell, chorus, çhin, bench; go, gem; thin, ðhis; sin, aš; expect, Xenophon, exist. ph = f. -clan, -tian = shān. -tion, -sion = shūn; ðion, -šion = zhūn. -tious, -cious, -sious = shūs. -ble, -dle, &c. = bēl, ðēl.

2. To become woven or interwoven.

"The amorous vine which in the elm still weaves."
W. Browne.

II. Manège: To make a motion of the head, neck, and body from side to side, like the shuttle of a weaver. (Said of a horse.)

wēave* (2), v. i. & t. [WAVE, v.]

A. Intrans.: To wave, to float, to fluctuate, to waver.

"Twixt life and death, long to and fro she weaved."
Spenser: F. Q., V. v. 10.

B. Trans.: To wave, to shake, to brandish.

"Shaking a pike . . . and weaving them amaine."
Hackluyt: Voyages, iii. 566.

wēav'-ēr, weyv'-er*, s. [Eng. weave (1), v.; -er.]

I. Ord. Lang.: One who weaves; one whose occupation is to weave cloth, &c.

"Then weavers stretch your stays upon the weft."
Dryden: Virgil; Georgic i. 381.

II. Technically:

1. Ornith.: A weaver-bird (q. v.).

"Weavers prefer to build on trees where the long slender twigs droop towards the ground, and so afford a nice vertical slender support."—Nature, May 31, 1888, p. 104.

2. Zoöl. (pl.): The Tubitellæ (q. v.). (Griffiths: Cuvier, xiii. 404.)

weaver-bird, s.

Ornith.: A popular name for any species of the family Ploceidæ (q. v.). Both the scientific and trivial names of these birds have reference to the remarkable structure of their nests. The Weaver-birds are large finches, with somewhat elongated bodies, moderate wings, long tails, and very bright coats, the latter often varied in the breeding season. Yellow and yellowish-red are the prevailing tints, but species occur in which black, red, white, or gray predominates. The Weaver-birds are extremely social, and many of the species live in large colonies during the period of incubation. The nests of the various species differ considerably in shape and general structure, some (as the genus Oriolus), building a separate nest for the male, while the female sits in another on her eggs, till relieved by her mate; others again contain more than one chamber, as that of the Golden Weaver-bird, Ploceus galbula; while the Social Weaver-birds, Ploceus or Philacterus socius, construct an umbrella-like roof, under which from 800 to 1,000 separate nests have been found. But in all cases fibers, slender twigs, or blades of grass are the materials employed, the whole being tightly woven, after having been rendered more flexible and adhesive by the application of saliva. The nests themselves consist of a more or less globular portion, elongated into a tube below, with the entrance at the bottom or at the side. They are very generally suspended at the extremities of branches, and often over water, probably as affording security against monkeys, snakes, and other enemies. The Mahali Weaver-bird (Ploceus taha) is said to insert thorns into its nest, as a further protection against marauders. It is a noteworthy fact that the Golden Weaver-bird has begun to build on the telegraph wires by the side of the railway in Natal, owing to the rapid destruction of the willows before advancing civilization (Nature, May 31, 1888).

weaver-finch, s.

Ornith.: Any individual of the Ploceidæ (q. v.).

"The Ploceidæ, or Weaver-finches, are especially characteristic of the Ethiopian region."—Wallace: Geog. Dist. Animals, ii. 286.

weaver-fish, s. [WEEVER.]

weaver's shuttle, s.

Zoöl.: Ovulum volva. The popular name has reference to its shape.

wēav'-ēr-ēss*, s. [Eng. weaver; -ess.] A female weaver.

"In the hands of an ancient weaver and weaveress."—J. H. Blunt: Hist. of Dursley, 222.

wēav'-līg, wev'-yng*, pr. par., a., & s. [WEAVE (1), v.]

A. & B. As pr. par. & particip. adj.: (See the verb.)

C. As subst.: The act of one who weaves; the act or process of producing cloth, &c., by the combination of flexible fibres. It is an art of very remote antiquity. The frame or apparatus on which cloth is woven is termed a loom (q. v.). In all kinds of weaving, whether plain or figured, one system of threads, called the woof or weft, is made to pass alternately under and over another system of threads called the warp, web, or chain. The essential operation of weaving is the successive raising of certain threads of the warp, and the depression of others for the reception of the weft-shot. This operation is called shedding. The web, which is of any convenient length, is kept stretched between two parallel beams, fixed horizontally between upright standards. The one beam, on which the warp is wound, is called the yarn-roll, and the other on which the cloth is wound, the cloth-beam or roll. The weft-shot is introduced or carried through the shed by the shuttle. Weaving is performed by hand on hand-loom, and by steam or other motive power on power-loom. In its most general sense, the term comprehends not only the making of those textile fabrics prepared in the loom, but also net-work, lacework, &c. Where the color of the yarn in warp and weft is the same, the process is called plain weaving, and the result is a fabric of uniform color, in which the warp and weft threads regularly interlace. Pattern weaving consists either in using different colors in warp or weft or in both, or in weaving with more complicated machines, or in combining both variations. Double weaving consists in weaving two webs simultaneously one above the other, and interweaving the two at intervals so as to form a double cloth. Kidderminster or Scotch carpeting is the chief example of this process. Pile weaving is the process by which fabrics like velvet, velveteen, corduroy, and Turkish carpets are produced. [LOOM (1), JACQUARD.]

¶ Though skins of animals formed the chief clothing material in the Stone Age, yet the arts of spinning and weaving were practiced, spindle-whorls and fabrics (the material is flax, hemp being unknown) having been found in the Swiss lake-dwellings of that period. The art of weaving seems to have existed in China and in India from a remote period of antiquity. It is also represented in sculpture on the Egyptian monuments at Thebes. Women, many of them slaves or devotees attached to temples, wove fabrics in Greece and Rome, while in Egypt the work was performed by men. The primeval looms were everywhere rude, but the Hindus, with humble machines, turn out excellent fabrics. In 1132 and 1331 continental weavers settled in England. In 1738, Mr. Charles Wyatt, of Birmingham, and Mr. Lewis Paul, a foreigner with whom he was in partnership, took out a patent for spinning by means of rollers, as did Arkwright in 1769. The first power loom for cotton-weaving was established in Glasgow in 1798. In 1801, Jacquard exhibited in Paris the loom called after him. In 1809, John Heathcoat, a stocking-weaver, invented the bobbin-net machine.

wēaz'-en, adj. [A. S. wisnian = to become dry; Icel. visna = to wither, from visinn = withered, palsied, dried up; Dan. & Sw. vissen = withered; Sw. vissna = to fade; O. H. Ger. wēsaren = to dry.] Thin, lean, wizened, withered.

weazen-faced, a. Wizen-faced, withered.

"The door . . . was opened, and a little beaz-eyed, weazen-faced ancient man came creeping out."—Dickens: Martin Chuzzlewit, ch. xi.

wēb, webbe, s. [A. S. webb, web; cogn. with Dut. web, webbe; Icel. vefr, genit. veffjar; Danish væv; Sw. väf; O. H. Ger. weppi, wappi; German gewebe. From the same root as weave (q. v.).]

I. Ordinary Language:

1. That which is woven; the piece of cloth woven in a loom; a texture.

"To compete with the costlier webs turned out at Spitalfields."—London Standard.

2. A piece of linen cloth.

3. The plexus of very delicate threads or filaments which a spider spins, and which serves as a web to catch flies and other insects for its food; a cob-web.

"Over them Arachne high did lift
Her cunning web, and spread her subtle net."
Spenser: F. Q., II. vii. 28.

4. Hence, fig., anything carefully contrived and artfully put together or woven, as a plot, scheme, or trap.

"What a tangled web we weave When first we practice to deceive."
Scott: Marmion, vi. 17.

5. Something resembling a web or sheet of cloth; specif., a large roll of paper such as is used in the web-press for newspapers and the like.

6. Applied to any plain, flat surface; as—

(1) A sheet or thin plate of metal.

"And there with stately pompe by heapes they wend,
And Christians slaine rolle up in webs of lead."
Fairefax: Godfrey of Boulogne, viii. 26.

(2) The blade of a sword.

"The brittle web of that rich sword, he thought Was broke through hardnesse of the counties sheeld."
Fairefax: Godfrey of Boulogne, vii. 4.

(3) The plate, or its equivalent, in a beam or girder which connects the upper and lower flat plates or laterally extending portions.

"This interval was strengthened by horizontal webs of iron plates."—London Daily Telegraph.

(4) The corresponding portion between the tread and foot of a railway-rail.

(5) That portion of a wheel, as of a railway-carriage, which extends between the hub and the rim, occupying the space where spokes would be in an ordinary wheel.

(6) The blade of a saw.

(7) In vehicles, a stout band of textile fabric, used as straps to limit the extension of the hood.

(8) That portion of an ordinary anvil which is of reduced size below the head, and from which the divergent horns proceed.

(9) The solid portion of the bit of a key.

(10) The arm of a crank connecting the shaft and the wrist.

(11) The thin sharp part of the coulter of a plow.

II. Technically:

1. Entom.: The term web is sometimes used of the silky sheath formed by various caterpillars within the rolled leaves constructed for their habitation and defense, the cocoon of the silkworm, &c.

2. Ornith.: A membrane in the Swimming Birds, uniting the three anterior toes, and in one order (the Steganopodes) extending also along the side of the foot to the great toe. In a rudimentary form the web is found also in some waders.

3. Zoöl.: Chiefly in the sense I. 3. All spiders do not weave webs, and those which do vary in the more or less regular form of the web produced. Two of the finest weavers are the Garden Spider, Epeira diadema, the web of which is of a fine geometric form, and the Common House Spider, Aranea domestica. [SPINNERET.] Used also of the membranes between the digits of some animals which are specially adapted for swimming, or are amphibious, as the Ornithorhynchus, the Otter, some breeds of Dogs, the Crocodiles, and the Water-lizards.

¶ Web and pin, Pin and web: The same as PIN (1), s., I. 9.

Pathol.: A disease of the eye arising from a film suffusing it; caligo.

web-fingered, a. Having the fingers united by a membrane.

"He was, it is said, web-footed naturally, and partially web-fingered."—Mayhew: London Labor and London Poor.

web-foot, s. A foot the toes of which are united by a web or membrane.

web-footed, a. Having web-feet; palmiped.

"Web-footed fowls do not live constantly upon the land, nor fear to enter the water."—Ray: On the Creation.

web-press, web printing-machine, s. A printing-machine which takes its paper from the web or roll.

web-saw, s. A frame-saw (q. v.).

web-wheel, s. A wheel in which the hub and rim are connected by a web or plate, which is sometimes perforated.

wēb, v. t. [WEB, s.] To cover with or as with a web; to envelop.

webbe*, s. [A. S. webba.] A weaver, a webber. (Chaucer: C. T., 364.)

wēbbed, a. [English web, s.; -ed.] Having the toes united by a membrane or web; as, The webbed feet of a goose or duck.

wēb'-bēr*, s. [English web; -er.] A weaver.

wēb'-blīng, s. [Eng. web, s.; -ing.] A woven band of cotton or flax, generally striped and used for girths, straining-pieces of saddles, surcingle, bed-bottoms, &c.

wēb'-bȳ, adj. [Eng. web, s.; -y.] Pertaining or relating to a web; consisting of or resembling a web.

"Bats on their webby wings in darkness move."
Crabbe: Parish Register.

"Hi sende her feble messagers in pouere monne weede."

Robert of Gloucester, p. 165.

wē-děl'-i-a (w as v), s. [Named after George Wolfgang Wedel, a German botanist.]

Bot.: A genus of Heliopteridæ. Herbs or undershrubs with serrate or three-cleft leaves and yellow radiate and composite flowers, with a pappus of toothed or hairy scales. Natives of America. The leaves of Wedelia calendulacea, a composite with a slight camphoraceous smell, are used in India as a hair-dye and to promote the growth of hair. In Lohardagga, in Bengal, the root is pounded, and gives a black dye with salts of iron. (Calcutta Exhib. Report.) The leaves are considered to be tonic and alterative; the seeds, flowers, and leaves in decoction are deobstruent.

wēdge (1), wegge, s. [A. S. wecg=a mass of metal, a wedge; cogn. with Dut. wig, wigge=a wedge; Icel. veggr; Dan. vægge; Sw. vigg; O. H. Ger. wekki, weggi; M. H. Ger. weche=a wedge. From the same root as wag.]

1. A piece of wood or metal, thick at one end and tapering to a thin edge at the other. It is a body contained under two triangular and three rectangular surfaces. The wedge is one of the mechanical powers, and is used for splitting wood, rocks, &c., for exerting great pressure, as in the oil-press [WEDGE-PRESS], and for raising immense weights, as when a ship is raised by wedges driven under the keel. All cutting and penetrating instruments, as knives, swords, chisels, razors, axes, nails, pins, needles, &c., may be considered as wedges, the angle of the wedge being in such cases more or less acute, according to the purpose for which it is intended. In the diagram, A B C is an isosceles wedge introduced into a cleft D F E, power being applied at the point H, in the center of A B. The resistance on each side and the power may be considered as three forces in equilibrium, and meeting in a point G. The sides of the triangle A B C are severally perpendicular to the directions of the three forces, and therefore, P: ½ R:: A B: A C, or the power is to the total resistance as half the back of the wedge is to the side of the wedge. The mechanical power of the wedge is increased by making the angle of penetration more acute. But no certain theory can be laid down concerning the power of the wedge, since being usually produced by the percussion of a hammer, mallet, &c., every stroke of which causes a tremor in the wedge, the resistance at the sides is for the instant thrown off.

"Forth goes the woodman . . . to wield the axe

And drive the wedge, in yonder forest drear."

Cowper: Task, v. 43.

*2. A mass of metal, especially one in the shape of a wedge.

"A wedge of gold of fifty shekels weight."—Joshua vii, 21.

3. Something in the shape of a wedge.

"The legion when they saw their time, bursting out like a violent wedge, quickly broke and dissipated what opposed them."—Milton: Hist. of Britain, bk. ii.

¶ The thin (or small) end of the wedge: A term used figuratively to express the first move, apparently of little importance, but destined or calculated ultimately to lead to important results.

wedge-bills, s. pl. [SCHISTES.]

wedge-press, s. A form of press, more used formerly than now, for expressing oil from crushed seeds.

1. Ord. Lang.: Having the shape of a wedge; cuneiform.

2. Bot.: Cuneate (q. v.).

¶ Wedge-shaped character: [CUNEIFORM.]

wedge-shell, s.

Zoöl.: A species of small marine bivalve belonging to Donax and allied genera in which the shell is wedge-shaped.

wedge-tailed eagle, s.

Ornith.: Uraetus audax, from Australia. Back and sides rust-color, rest of body blackish-brown; feathers of wings and upper tail-coverts tipped with pale-brown.

wedge-wise, adv. In the manner of a wedge.

"And thus wedge-wise by little and little they spread broader and broader behind."—P. Holland: Pliny, bk. x., ch. xxiii.

wēdge (2), s. [See def.] In Cambridge (England) University a name given to the man who stands last in the list of the classical tripos; said to be taken from the name (Wedgwood) of the man who occupied this place on the first list in 1824. (Also called Wooden-wedge.) [SPOON, s., ¶ (4).]

wēdge, v. t. [WEDGE (1), s.]

*1. To cleave with a wedge or wedges; to rive. (Lit. & fig.)

"When my heart,

As wedged with a sigh, would rive in twain."

Shakesp.: Troilus and Cressida, i. 1.

2. To drive in a wedge; to crowd in; to compress.

"Wedged in one body like a flight of cranes."

Pope: Homer's Iliad, xvii. 846.

*3. To force, as a wedge forces its way.

"Part . . . rang'd in figure, wedge their way Intelligent of seasons."—Milton: P. L., vii. 426.

4. To fasten with a wedge; or with wedges.

"Wedge on the keenest scythes,

And give us steeds that snort against the foe."

A. Philips. (Todd.)

5. To fix in the manner of a wedge.

"They often find great lumps wedged between the rocks as if it naturally grew there."—Dampier: Voyages (an. 1685).

wēdg'-īng, pr. par., a. & s. [WEDGE, v.]

A. & B. As pr. par. & particip. adj.: (See the verb.)

C. As substantive:

Pottery: The process of dividing a lump of clay and dashing the parts together in a direction different from its former contact. It brings the mass to a homogeneous condition, develops plasticity, and expels air-bubbles.

Wēdg'-wood, Wēdge'-wood, subst. [See compounds.]

Wedgwood-pyrometer, s.

Physics: A pyrometer in which temperature was ascertained by the contraction of baked clay, measured before and after its subjection to the action of heat. It was not trustworthy, for clay exposed for a long period to a moderate amount of heat will be as much reduced in bulk as by an intensely high temperature continued for a brief period.

Wedgwood-ware, s.

Pottery: A peculiar kind of English pottery ware made by Josiah Wedgwood (1730-95), in which artistic designs and treatment were joined to mechanical and technical excellence. Professor Church thus enumerates the several varieties or "bodies" of the ware in the order of invention or improvement: 1. Cream-colored ware, called Queen's ware, in various hues of cream-color, saffron, and straw. 2. Egyptian black, or basaltes-ware, used for seals, plaques, life-size busts, medallion portraits, &c. 3. Red ware, or Rosso antico, not equal in quality of color or fineness of grain to the earlier work of John Philip Elers, of Bradwell Wood, England. 4. White semi-porcelain, or fine stoneware, differing from the white jasper in its pale straw-colored or grayish hue, and in its waxlike smooth surface and sub-translucency. 5. Variegated ware, of two kinds, one a cream-colored body, marbled, mottled, or spangled with divers colors upon the surface and under the glaze; the other an improved kind of agate ware, in which the colored clays in bands, twists, stripes, and waves constituted the entire substance. 6. Jasper ware, in which the chief triumphs of Wedgwood were wrought, resembling outwardly the finest of his white terra-cotta and semi-porcelain bodies. One of his earliest recipes for this last-named ware was, in percentage, barytes, 57.1; clay, 28.6; flint, 9.5; barium carbonate, 4.8; the novelty of these components being those of the barytes and barium carbonate. A very little cobalt was occasionally added, even to the white jasper ware, to neutralize the yellowish hue, and by introducing a little Cornish stone or other felspathic material it became less opaque and more wax-like. There are seven colors in this ware besides the white—blue of various shades, lilac, pink, sage-green, olive-green, yellow, and black—and it is remarkable for the absence of bubbles and holes, the flatness of the field, and the uniformity of grain. It was produced in numberless forms—cameos, intaglios, portrait medallions, statuettes, vases, &c., and the yellow variety is rare. Wedgwood's artistic work consists not only in copies of antique gems and in the adaptation of antique designs, but in the original productions of many English and foreign draughtsmen and modelers; foremost among the former must be placed the great artist Flaxman. His chief mark is the name "Wedgwood," impressed in Roman characters in the paste before firing, the size of the letters ranging from $\frac{1}{4}$ to $\frac{3}{8}$ of an inch in height. During his partnership with Bentley the name of the latter was conjoined to his own. In some cases the word "Etruria" is added. The name "Josiah Wedgwood," with a date beneath, belongs to a time when the works at Etruria—now a town of about 5,000 inhabitants—were carried on by the son of the founder; in more recent times the simple name "Wedgwood" has been reverted to. Small marks, chiefly those of workmen, are found on pieces of old Wedgwood ware; Miss Meteyard gives no fewer than one hundred of these, but Wedgwood—like too many other manufacturers, both past and present—suppressed as far as possible such indications of the individuality of his designers.

wědg'-y, a. [Eng. wedge (1), s.; -y.] Wedge-shaped; like a wedge.

wěd'-lōck, *wed-lok, *wedloke, s. [A. S. wed-lāk=a pledge, from wed=a pledge, and lāk=sport, a gift, in token of pleasure, hence the gift given to a bride. The reference is to the practice of giving a present to the bride on the morning after marriage; cf. German morgengabe=a nuptial (lit. morning) gift.]

A. & B. As pr. par. & particip. adj.: (See the verb.)

C. As substantive:

1. The act of clearing away weeds, or anything noxious or injurious.

¶ Weeding by electricity: (See extract.)

"In many parts of the south, where swamps and jungles abound, all kinds of vegetation are very rapid in growth, and it has been a matter of great difficulty, as well as of considerable expense, for the railroad companies to keep the roadbeds from being overgrown with wild grasses and noxious weeds of one kind and another. Fire was tried in getting rid of the pest, but it only scorched the tops, leaving the roots still strong and vigorous. Strong brine was poured over the roadbeds. It was more efficacious in killing the vegetation, but its use was very expensive and it corroded the rails. A jet of steam was turned on the vegetation, but it had little effect, and gasoline burners were suspended from the locomotives passing over the weeds, but they failed to destroy the weeds. At last it occurred to A. A. Sharp, division superintendent of the Illinois Central Railroad at Memphis, Tenn., to try if this obnoxious growth might not be destroyed by electrocution, and he devised and patented a contrivance for the purpose. To an ordinary flatcar he attached a machine in the form of a circular brush suspended at right angles to the track and of sufficient length to extend over the ends of the ties. It was studded thickly with fine copper wire, which came into contact with the weeds and grasses on the track as the car passed over the road, the brush being so constructed that it could be raised or lowered at will. This brush was attached to an electric generator by fine wire, through which a strong current of electricity passed to the brush and from it to the weeds through which it was driven. Its touch killed the weeds, root and branch. The machine, after thorough trial, has been pronounced a great weeding success and is likely to come into general use in that part of the country."—Railway Age.

*2. Weeds.

"He weeds the corn, and still lets grow the weeding."
Shakesp.: Love's Labor's Lost, i. 1.

weēfs, s. pl. [See def.]

Timber Trade: A name given in some parts of the country to what are more commonly termed binders (q. v.). They are called weefs, from weave, because they are used in weaving materials together, especially in crate-making. (Timber Trade Journal.) weēk, weeke, weke, wike, woke, wouke, wycke, wyke, s. [A. S. wice, wicu, wuce, wucu; cogn. with Dut. week; Icel. vika; Sw. vecka; O. H. Ger. wecha, wehha; M. H. Ger. woche; Dan. uge.]

I. Ordinary Language:

1. The space of seven days; the space from one Sunday, Monday, &c., to another; the most obvious and convenient division of the natural or lunar month. The division of time into weeks did not exist among the aborigines of America when the New World was discovered, nor did it exist among the Polynesians, the Japanese, or, it is now believed, the Chinese. It is nearly universal in India, and was found thoroughly rooted when the first Christians went to that country. So has it been from a period of high antiquity in Scandinavia, the names of the several days being connected with identically the same planets in the two regions; so that, if at noon on Sunday in Sweden one could be transported in a moment to India, he would find it Aditwar (=Sunday) there, and so of any other day in the week. The Hebrews, and it is thought the other Semites, had the institution of weeks [II.], the days apparently being simply numbered first, second, third, &c. During the early centuries of their history the Greeks and the Romans had not the institution of weeks, there having been ancient forgery in connection with Homer's oft-quoted passages on the subject. Dion Cassius, in the second century after Christ (Hist., xxxvii. 18), considered that the week with the planetary names of the days had been introduced into Rome only recently, and from Egypt. The establishment of Christianity under Constantine confirmed the change, and thence the septenary division of time spread to the whole Christian, and subsequently to the Mohammedan world. One school of theologians attributes the wide prevalence of septenary institutions to the Sabbath having been divinely instituted at the Creation; another regards the week as a fourth part of a lunar month.

*2. Applied to the week-days, or working-days, as opposed to Sundays.

"Divide the Sunday from the week."

Shakesp.: Hamlet, i. 1.

II. Script.: In Genesis ii. 2, 3, the reason why the division of time into weeks began is stated to be that God occupied six days in the work of creation, and rested upon the seventh day, which He consequently hallowed. Seven from this time forth constantly occurs, and obviously becomes a sacred number. (Cf. Gen. iv. 15, vii. 2, xxi. 28, xxix. 18, 20, xxxiii. 3, &c.) Traces of division of time into weeks appear in Gen. vii. 4, viii. 10, 12, &c., till the Sabbath (q. v.) is mentioned by name (Exod. xvi. 23, 26). A week of weeks (=49 days) was also recognized. [¶ (1).] The first day of the seventh month was a Sabbath (Lev. xxiii. 24), and the whole month was somewhat sacred, being little more than a succession of feasts and Sabbaths (verses 27, 28, 34, 39, &c.). The seventh year was sacred, the very land obtaining Sabbatic rest (Exod. xxiii. 11, Lev. xxv. 1-7, Deut. xv. 9, 12); and after seven times seven years came the Jubilee (q. v.) (Lev. xxv. 8-55).

Seventy, as having seven for one of its factors, was sacred (Exod. xxiv. 1), and seventy weeks constituted a prophetic period (Dan. ix. 24-27).

weē'-vēr, subst. [The same word as VIPER and WYVERN (q. v.).] [QUAVIVER.]

Ichthy.: The popular name of two European fishes: Trachinus draco, the Greater, and T. vipera, the Lesser Weever. The first, which is the rarer of the two, is from twelve to eighteen inches long, and an excellent food-fish; the second, which is from four to five inches long, is common on the coasts of the English Channel. These fish have the power of inflicting painful wounds with their dorsal and opercular spines. No special organ for the secretion of poison has been found, but the mucus in the vicinity of the spines has decidedly poisonous properties. The dorsal spine and the spine on the operculum have a deep double groove in which the mucus lodges, and by which it is introduced into punctured wounds. In France, the fishermen are required, under a penalty, to cut off the spines of weevers before selling them.

weē'-vīl, *we-vel, *wi-uel, *we-vyl, wy-vel, s. [A. S. wifel, wibil=a kind of beetle; Low Ger. & O. Dut. wevel; O. H. Ger. wibil, wibel; Lith. wabalas.]

Entom.: The popular English name for any beetle of the family Curculionidæ, and especially those which force themselves on notice by damage done by their larvæ, and sometimes also by themselves, in fields, granaries, &c. Rhynchites betuli, a small blue or green glossy beetle, attacks the vine and the pear-tree; R. alliaris, a still smaller one, attacks the leaves of fruit trees in general; and R. cupreus, the shoots and the fruit of the plum and the apricot. Nemoicus oblongus feeds on the young leaves of fruit trees; Hylobius abietis and Pissodes notatus, on the wood of the pine; Calandra granaria, on the grain in granaries; Ceutorynchus assimilis and C. contractus, on the leaves of turnips, and there are many others. The Nut Weevil is Balaninus nucum; the Rice Weevil, Sitophilus oryzae.

wēight, *wāight (gh silent), wayght, *weight, *weyght, *wight, s. [A. S. gewiht; cogn. with O. Dut. wicht, gewicht; Dut. gewicht; Ger. gewicht; Icel. vætt; Dan. vægt; Sw. vigt.] [WEIGH, v.]

I. Ordinary Language:

1. That property of bodies through which they tend toward the center of the earth; gravity.

2. The measure of the force of gravity, as determined for any particular body; in a popular sense, the amount which any body weighs; the quantity of matter as estimated by the balance, or expressed numerically with reference to some standard unit.

"The weight of an hair will turn the scales between their avoirdupois."—Shakesp.: Henry IV., Pt. II., ii. 4.

3. A piece (usually) of metal of known gravity, and used with scales to determine the gravity of other bodies.

4. A particular scale, system, or mode of ascertaining the relative heaviness of bodies: as, troy weight, avoirdupois weight, &c. Weights vary according to the commodity they are intended to weigh. Thus the following are all in use: (1) The grain, computed decimally, for scientific purposes; (2) troy weight; (3) troy ounce, with decimal multiples and divisions, called bullion weight; (4) bankers' weights for sovereigns; (5) apothecaries' weight; (6) Diamond weight and pearl weight, including the carat; (7) Avoirdupois weight; (8) weights for hay and straw; (9) wool-weights, using as factors, 2, 3, 7, 13, and their multiples; (10) coal-weights, decimal numbers 1, .5, .2, .1, .05, .025. Besides these the gramme, &c., of French metric system, are used by many scientists. The hundred weight may mean 100 lbs., 112 lbs., or 120 lbs. A pound weight varies in the avoirdupois and the troy.

5. A heavy mass; something heavy.

"A man leapeth better with weights in his hands than without."—Bacon: Natural History.

6. In clocks, one or two masses of metal which by their weight actuate the machinery.

7. Pressure, burden, load.

"Burdened with like weight of pain."

Shakesp.: Comedy of Errors, ii. 1.

8. Importance, consequence, moment, impressive-ness.

"Such a point of weight, so near mine honour."

Shakesp.: Henry VIII., iii. 1.

9. Power, influence, importance, consideration.

"If any man of weight, loyal, able and well informed, would repair to Saint Germain's and explain the state of things, his majesty would easily be convinced."—Macaulay: Hist. Eng., ch. xii.

II. Technically:

1. Physics: The measure of the force of a body acted on by gravitation; the downward pressure of a body thus acted upon. As it is produced by the influence of gravity on all the particles of the body, it is proportioned to the quantity of matter in the body. Weight obviously exists in solids and liquids; it does so also in gases, though their extreme fluidity and expansibility may seem to suggest the contrary. Weight being produced by the action of gravity, it slightly increases as the body is removed from the equator toward the poles, owing to the flattening of the earth in the latter region; the diminished speed at which the earth rotates in high latitudes has a similar influence; a body also weighs less on a mountain top than on a plain, being at a greater distance from the earth's mass. It is also slightly affected by the temperature of the air and its barometric pressure. [DENSITY, GRAVITY.]

2. Mech.: The resistance which in a machine has to be overcome by the power; in the simpler mechanical powers, as the lever, wheel and axle, pulley, and the like, usually the heavy body that is set in motion or held in equilibrium by the power.

3. Pathol.: A sensation of heaviness or pressure over the whole body, or any portion of it; as, a weight on the stomach. In the case of the organ just mentioned, this generally arises from undigested food.

¶ Dead weight: A heavy, oppressive, or greatly impeding burden.

weight-carrier, subst. A horse stout and strong enough to carry a heavy rider.

"Fifteen weight-carriers, including Redskin."—Field, March 20, 1886.

Naut.: A nail heavier than a deck-nail, and used for fastening buttons, cleats, &c.

Lathe: A rest which is held steadily upon the shears by a weight suspended beneath.

Instruments: A glass cylinder to which is joined a bent capillary glass tube, open at the end. It is weighed first empty, and then when filled with mercury, the subtraction of the smaller from the larger number gives the weight of the mercury. It is then raised to a known temperature, when a certain quantity of the expanding mercury passes out. From this the temperature can be deduced.

wēight (gh silent), v. t. [WEIGHT, s.] To add or attach a weight or weights to; to load with additional weight; to cause to carry additional weight; to add to the heaviness of.

"Dark arts are in certain quarters practiced to a lamentable extent in disguising and weighting teas."—London Daily Telegraph.

wēight'-ēd (gh silent), pa. par. or a. [WEIGHT, v.] weighted-lathe, s. A lathe in which the rest is held down firmly on the shears by a suspended weight.

1. The quality or state of being weighty; heaviness, gravity, ponderosity, weight.

"The cave in which these beares lay sleeping sound, Was but of earth, and with her weightiness Upon them fell."—Spenser: Faerie Queene, Time.

2. Solidity, force, impressiveness; power of convincing; as, the weightiness of an argument.

3. Importance.

"Before a due examination be made proportionable to the weightiness of the matter."—Locke: On Human Understanding, bk. ii., ch. xxi.

wēight'-īng (gh silent), s. [Eng. weight; -ing.]

Found.: The act of holding down the flasks in which the mold has been made so as to resist the upward pressure of the metal.

wēight'-lēss (gh silent), adj. [English weight; -less.]

1. Having no weight; light, imponderable.

"Light and weightless down

Perforce must move."—Shakesp.: Henry IV., Pt. II., iv. 4.

2. Of no importance or consideration.

"And so [they] are oft-times emboldened to rouse upon them as from aloft very weak and weightless discourses."—Bp. Hall: Apol. against Brownists, § 1.

wēight'-mēnt (gh silent), subst. [Eng. weight; -ment.] The act of weighing.

"Accepted after full examination, approval, and weightment by the respondents."—London Times.

wēight'-ŷ, *wāight'-ŷ (gh silent), wayght-y, a. [Eng. weight, s.; -y.]

1. Having or being of great weight; heavy, ponderous.

"It is too weighty for your grace to wear."

Shakesp.: Richard III., iii. 1.

Shakesp.: Taming of the Shrew, i. 1.

4. Burdensome; hard to bear.

"The cares of empire are great, and the burthen, which lies upon the shoulders of princes, very weighty."—Atterbury: Sermons, vol. i., ser. 8.

*5. Grave or serious in aspect.

*6. Entitled to authority on account of experience, ability, or character.

*7. Rigorous, severe.

"If, after two days' shine, Athens contains thee, Attend our weightier judgment."

Shakesp.: Timon, iii. 5.

wēil, wīel, subst. [A. S. wæl; O. Dut. wael.] A small whirlpool. (Scotch.)

"Claymores o' the Hielanders, and the deep waters and wells o' the Avondow."—Scott: Rob Roy, ch. xxxv.

weīn-mān'-nē-æ (w as v), s. pl. [Mod. Latin weinmann(ia); Lat. fem. pl. adj. suff. -æ.]

Bot.: A tribe of Cunoniaceæ (q. v.).

weīn-mān'-nī-ā (w as v), s. [Named after John Wm. Weinmann, a Ratisbon apothecary and botanist, who about 1750 published his Phytanthoza Iconographica.]

Bot.: The typical genus of Weinmanniæ (q. v.). Evergreen shrubs or trees, with reticulated petioles, compound or simple leaves, calyx four-parted, petals four, stamens eight, an hypogynous disk, fruit a many-seeded capsule. About forty species are known, from South America, South Africa, Madagascar, New Zealand, &c. The bark is astringent; that of one species is used in Peru for tanning leather, and for adulterating Peruvian bark (q. v.), and that of W. tinctoria is employed in Bourbon for dyeing red.

wēir, *wear, *wer, subst. [A. S. wer=a weir, a dam; lit.=a defense, and allied to werian=to defend, to protect; Icel. vörr=a fenced-in landing-place; ver=a fishing-station; Ger. wehr=a defense; wehren=to defend; mühlwehr=a mill-dam.]

1. A dam across a stream to raise the level of the water above it. The water may be conducted to a mill, a sluice, or a fish-trap.

"A pleasant rumor smote the ear,

Like water rushing through a weir."

Longfellow: Tales of a Wayside Inn. (Prelude.)

2. A fence or inclosure of stakes, twigs, or nets, set in a stream, or in a bay or inlet of the sea, to catch fish.

wēird, *wierd, *wirde, *wyrde, s. & a. [A. S. wyrd, wird, wurd=fate, destiny; cogn. with Icel. widr=fate; M. H. Ger. wurth=fate, death, from the same root as A. S. weordhan; Icel. verdha; Ger. werden=to become.]

A. As substantive:

1. Fate, destiny; formerly one of the Norns or Fates.

"And this weird shall overtake thee."

Scott: Bridal of Triermain, ii. 26.

2. A spell, a charm.

B. As adjective:

1. Pertaining to or connected with fate or destiny; influencing or able to influence fate.

2. Relating to or partaking of the nature of witchcraft; supernatural, unearthly, wild; suggestive of unearthliness.

"Those sweet, low tones, that seemed like a weird incantation."

Longfellow: Evangeline, ii. 4.

wēird'-nēss, s. [Eng. weird; -ness.] The quality or state of being weird; unearthliness, eeriness.

"Mingling in daintiest fashion the weirdness of fairy lore with what Parisians call the latest 'cry of actuality.'"—London Daily Chronicle.

wēise, wēize, v. t. [Icel. visa; Dan. vise; Ger. weisen=to show, to point out, to indicate.] To direct, to guide, to turn, to incline. (Scotch.) wē-īsm, s. [Eng. we; -ism.] The excessive or too frequent use of the pronoun we; wegotism.

weiss'-ī-ā (w as v), s. [Named after F. W. Weiss, a German botanist.]

Bot.: The typical genus of Weissiæ (q. v.).

weiss'-ī-ē-ī (w as v), s. pl. [Mod. Lat. weissi(a); Lat. masc. pl. adj. suff. -ei.]

Botany: An order or a tribe of Pleurocarpous Mosses, having leaves of close texture, an erect equal capsule, a peristome either absent or with sixteen teeth, and a dimidiate veil. (Berkeley.)

weiss'-īg-īte (w as v), s. [After Weistag, near Dresden, where found; suff. -ite (Min.).]

Min.: A variety of orthoclase felspar occurring in very small whitish twinned crystals in cavities of an amygdaloidal rock.

weiss'-īte (w as v), subst. [After the crystallographer, Prof. Weiss, of Berlin; suff. -ite (Min.).]

Min.: An altered form of Iolite (q. v.), resembling fahlunite in most of its characters, and included by Dana under that species.

wēlch'-ēr, s. [WELSHER.]

Wēlch'-man, s. [WELSHMAN.]

wēl'-cōme, *wel-com, *wil-kome, subst., a. & interj. [A. S. wilcuma=one who comes so as to please another, from wil, pref., allied to will=will, pleasure, and cuma=a comer, from cuman=to come; cogn. with Ger. wilkommen=welcome; O. H. Ger. willicomo, from willjo=will, pleasure, and komen (Ger. kommen)=to come. The change in meaning was due to Icel. velkominn=welcome, from vel=well, and kominn, pa. par. of koma=to come; Dan. velkommen=welcome; Sw. välkommen. (Skeat.)] bōil, bōy; pōut, jōwl; cat, çell, chorus, çhin, bench; go, gem; thin, ðhis; sin, aš; expect, Xenophon, exist. ph=f. -cian, -tian = şan. -tion, -sion = şūn; -ñion, -şion = zhūn. -tious, -cious, -sious = şūs. -ble, -dle, &c. = bel, del.

A. As substantive:1. A salutation of a new-comer.

"Their shout of welcome, shrill and wide, Shook the steep mountain's steady side."
Scott: Lady of the Lake, iii. 31.

2. A kind reception of a guest or new-comer.

"Whoe'er has traveled life's dull round,
Where'er his stages may have been,
May sigh to think he still has found
His warmest welcome at an inn."
Shenstone: Lines Written on Window of an Inn.

B. As adjective:1. Received with pleasure or gladness; admitted willingly to one's house, entertainment, or company.

"When the glad soul is made heaven's welcome guest."
Cowper: Progress of Error, 165.

Producing gladness or pleasure; pleasing, grateful.

3. A term of courtesy implying readiness to serve another, the granting of a liberty, freedom to have and enjoy, and the like.

"Lord Helicane, a word."
"With me? and welcome!"
Shakesp.: Pericles, ii. 4.

C. As interj.: A word used in welcoming or saluting a new-comer.

"He waved his huntsman's cap on high, Cried, 'Welcome, welcome, noble lord!'"
Scott: The Chase, vii.

¶ Welcome to our House:

Bot.: Euphorbia cyparissias.

wěl'-cōme, v. t. [WELCOME, s.]

1. To salute, as a new-comer, with kindness; to receive with kindness or hospitality.

"I was aboard twice or thrice, and very kindly welcomed."
Dampier: Voyages (an. 1682).

2. To receive with pleasure; to be pleased with.

"A brow unbent that seemed to welcome woe."
Shakesp.: Rape of Lucrece, 1,509.

wěl'-cōme-lŷ, adv. [Eng. welcome; -ly.] In a welcome manner. (Annandale.)

wěl'-cōme-nēss, wel-com-ness, s. [Eng. welcome; -ness.] The quality or state of being welcome; agreeableness, gratefulness.

"Yet will they really still continue new, not only upon the scores of their welcomeness, but by their perpetually equal, because infinite, distance from a period."
Boyle: Works, i. 291.

wěl'-cōm-ēr, subst. [Eng. welcom(e); -er.] One who welcomes; one who bids welcome; one who receives with kindness or pleasure.

"Farewell, thou woful welcomer of glory."
Shakesp.: Richard III, iv. 1.

wēld (1), welde, wold, wolde, s. [Skeat believes it an English word, perhaps from well, s., because it is boiled for dyeing. Scotch wald; Ger. wau; Dan. & Sw. vau; Dut. wouw; Fr. gaude; Ital. guado; Port. gualde, gauda; Sp. gualda. Mahn identifies it with woad, from which, however, it is distinct.]

Bot.: Reseda luteola. It is a branched Mignonette, two or three feet high, with linear, lanceolate, undivided leaves, long spike-like racemes of flowers, three or five yellow petals, four sepals, and three stigmas. It occurs in Europe, western Asia and northern Africa, and has been introduced into the United States. It yields a yellow dye. A paint is also made from it called Dutch pink. Dyers' green is Genista tinctoria. [DYER'S-WEED, 2; RESEDA.]

wēld (2), s. [WELD, v.] The junction of metals by heating and hammering the parts. It differs from soldering and brazing in that no more fusible metal is made to form a bond of union between the parts. The partial fusion of the parts may be assisted by a flux, bifax for instance. Great pressure may make a perfect weld without applied heat. It is probable that heat is developed at the point of junction.

wēld (2), v. t. [Prob. well, the d being excrescent, the word being a particular use of the verb well=(1) to boil up, (2) to spring up as a fountain, (3) to heat to a high degree, (4) to beat heated iron; cf. Sw. välla (lit.=to well)=to weld; Dut. wellen=to boil, to unite, to weld.]

1. Lit.: To unite or join together, as two pieces of metal, by hammering or compressing them after they have been raised to a great heat. The pressure is applicable to but few of the metals, iron fortunately being preëminent among these. Platinum also possesses this property, which is utilized in forming the granules in which it is received from its sources of production into masses of sufficient size to be practically useful in the arts. Horn, tortoiseshell, and a few other substances may also be joined by welding.

2. Fig.: To unite very closely.

"To weld the three kingdoms into an inseparable union of sentiment and heart, as well as of interest."
London Weekly Echo.

wēld'-a-ble, a. [Eng. weld (2), v.; -able.] Capable of being welded.

"Steel, like wrought iron, possesses the important quality of being weldable."
Cassell's Technical Educator, pt. xii., p. 356.

wēld'-ēd, pa. par. or a. [WELD (2), v.] welded-tube, s. A gas or water-pipe made of a skelp bent to a circular form, raised to a welding-heat in an appropriate furnace, and as it leaves, almost at a point of fusion, it is dragged by the chain of a draw-bench through a pair of bell-mouthed jaws. These are opened at the moment of introducing the end of the skelp, which is welded without the agency of a mandrel.

wēld'-ēr (1), subst. [Eng. weld (1), v.; -er.] In Ireland, a manager; an actual occupant; a tenant of land under a middleman or series of middlemen.

"Such immediate tenants have others under them, and so a third and fourth in subordination, till it comes to the welder, as they call him, who sits at a rack-rent, and lives miserably."
Swift: Against the Power of Bishops.

wēld'-ēr (2), s. [Eng. weld (2), v.; -er.] One who welds.

wēld'-lŷng, pr. par., a. & s. [WELD (2), v.]

A. & B. As pr. par. & particip. adj.: (See the verb.)

C. As subst.: The process of uniting two pieces of a fusible material together by hammering or by compression while softened by heat.

welding-heat, s. The heat necessary for welding two pieces of metal; specifically, the white heat to which iron bars are brought when about to undergo this process.

welding-machine, s. A machine for uniting the edges of plates previously bent, so as to lap within a chamber when they are exposed to a gas-flame, and from which they pass to the rolls or hammer which completes the joint.

welding-swage, s. A block or fulling-tool for assisting the closure of a welded joint.

wēld'-wōrt, s. [Eng. weld (1), and wort.]

Bot. (pl.): The order Resedaceæ (q. v.). Called also in English Resedads. (Lindley.)

weld-y, a. [English weld (1), v.; -y.] Wieldy, active.

weld-yng, s. [WELD (1), v.] Power, governance, direction.

"Ye have them in youre might and in youre weldyng."
Chaucer: Tale of Melibæus.

wele, adv. [WELL, adv.]

wele, s. [WEAL.]

wele-ful, a. [WEALFUL.]

wele-ful-ness, s. [Mid. Eng. weleful; -ness.] Happiness, prosperity, good fortune.

welew, v. i. [Probably the same word as welk (q. v.).] To fade, to wither.

"Whanne the sunne roos up it welewide for hete, and it driede up."
Wycliffe: Mark iv.

wēl'-färe, s. [Eng. well, adv., and fare.] The state of faring well; a state of exemption from misfortune, trouble, calamity, or evil; the enjoyment of health and prosperity; well-being, success, prosperity.

"We have been praying for our husbands' welfare."
Shakesp.: Merchant of Venice, v.

wel-ful, a. [WEALFUL.]

wēlk, wēlke, v. i. & t. [Dut. & Ger. welken=to wither, to fade; from welk=dry, lean.]

A. Intransitive:1. To fade, to wither.*2. To decline, to set, to fall, to wane.

"When ruddy Phœbus gins to welke in west."
Spenser: F. Q., I. i. 23.

B. Transitive:1. To fade, to wither.*2. To contract, to shorten.

"Now sad Winter welked hath the day."
Spenser: Shepherd's Calendar; November.

welk, s. [WELK.]

wēlked (1), adj. [WELK, v.] Faded, declined, waned, set.

"By that the welked Phœbus gan avail His wearie waine."
Spenser: Shepherd's Calendar; January.

wēlked (2), a. [WELKED.]

wēl'-kĭn, wel-ken, wel-kine, wel-kne, wel-kene, weolcene, wolcne, wolkne, s. & a. [A. S. wolcnu=clouds; pl. of wolcen=a cloud;

O. Sax. wolkan; O. H. Ger. wolchan; Ger. wolke. Origin doubtful, perhaps from wealcan=to roll, to walk.]

A. As subst.: The sky; the vault of heaven. (Now only used in poetry.)

"Black stormy clouds deform'd the welkin's face,
And from beneath was heard a wailing sound."
Thomson: Castle of Indolence, ii. 44.

B. As adj.: Sky-blue.

"Look on me with your welkin eye."
Shakesp.: Winter's Tale, i. 2.

wēll, wel, welle, s. [A. S. wella, well, wylla, wylle, wyll, from weallan (pa. t. weol, pa. par. weallen)=to well up, to boil; cogn. with Icel. vell=ebullition, from vella=to well, to boil (pa. t. vall); Dut. wel=a spring; Dan. væld=a spring; Ger. wel-len=a wave, from wallen=to undulate, to boil, to bubble up.]

I. Ordinary Language:1. Literally:

(1) A spring, a fountain; water issuing from the earth.

"Of welles swete and cold ynou."

(2) An artificial structure from which a supply of water is obtained for domestic or other purposes; a shaft dug or bored in the ground to obtain water, and walled or lined with bricks, &c., to prevent the caving in of the sides.

"The book of Genesis (the most venerable monument of antiquity, considered merely with a view to history), will furnish us with frequent instances of violent contentions concerning wells; the exclusive property of which appears to have been established in the first digger or occupant, even in such places where the ground and herbage remained yet in common."
Blackstone: Comment., bk. ii., ch. 1.

(3) A similar structure or shaft sunk into the earth to procure oil, brine, &c.

2. Figuratively:

(1) A spring, a source, an origin.

"Crist, that of perfeccion is welle."
Chaucer: C. T., 5,690.

(2) The space in a law-court, immediately in front of the judge's bench, occupied by counsel, &c.

(3) The hollow part between the seats of a jaunting-car, used for holding luggage, &c.

* (4) (See extract.)

"A well, in the language of those seas, denotes one of the whirlpools, or circular eddies, which wheel and boil with astonishing strength, and are very dangerous."
Scott: Pirate, ch. xxxviii. (Note.)

II. Technically:

1. Arch.: The space in a building in which wind-stairs are placed, usually lighted from the roof; sometimes limited to the open space in the middle of a winding-staircase, or to the opening in the middle of a staircase built round a hollow newel. Called also a Well-hole and Well-staircase.

2. Mil. mining: An excavation in the earth, with branches or galleries running out of it.

3. Mining: The lower part of a furnace into which the water falls.

4. Nautical:

(1) A partition to enclose the pumps from the bottom to the lower decks, to render them accessible, and prevent their being damaged.

(2) A compartment in a fishing-vessel, formed by bulkheads properly strengthened and tightened off, having the bottom perforated with holes, to give free admission to the water, so that fish may be kept alive therein.

¶ (1) Artesian well: [ARTESIAN-WELL.]

(2) Dark well: [DARK-WELL.]

(3) Mineral well: A well containing mineral waters. [MINERAL-WATERS.]

well-boat, s. A fishing-boat having a well in it to convey fish alive to market. [WELL, s., B. 4 (2).]

well-borer, s. One who or that which digs or bores for water; a well-digger or maker.

well-bucket, s. A vessel used for drawing water from a well.

well-deck, s.

Naut.: An open space in a ship between the fore-castle and poop. (Used also adjectively.)

"The objection to the well-deck ship is not due to structural form, but to the simple point whether, if a sea should flood the hollow between her fore-castle and her poop, her capacity of buoyancy is equal to the support of this additional load of tons upon tons weight of water."
London Daily Telegraph.

1. A drain or vent for water, somewhat like a pit or well, serving to discharge the water of wet land.

2. A drain leading to a well.

well-drain, v. t. To drain, as land, by means of wells or pits, which receive the water, and from which it is discharged by means of machinery.

well-dressing, s.

Anthrop.: An old custom observed at Tissington, in Derbyshire, England, of dressing the wells and springs with flowers on Ascension Day. After morning prayer, a procession is formed, headed by the clergymen, and the wells are visited and prayers offered and hymns sung at each well. The custom is said to commemorate a fearful drought which visited Derbyshire in the summer of 1615, during which time the wells of Tissington flowed as usual. More probably it is a survival of water-worship (q. v.).

"In consequence of its questionable origin, whether Pagan or Popish, we have heard some good but strait-laced people condemn the well-dressing greatly."—Chambers: Book of Days, i. 597.

well-flowering, s.

Anthrop.: Well-dressing (q. v.).

"The pure sparkling water . . . makes this feast of the well-flowering one of the most beautiful of all the old customs that are left in 'merrie England.'"—Chambers: Book of Days, i. 596.

well-grass, †well-kerse, s.

Bot.: Nasturtium officinale. (Scotch.) well-head, s. The source, head, or origin of a river, &c., a spring of water.

"Up to the saddle-girths in a well-head, as the springs are called."—Scott: Old Mortality, ch. xv.

well-hole, s.

1. Ord. Lang.: A cavity which receives a counter-balancing weight in some mechanical contrivances.
2. Arch.: The same as WELL, s., II. 1.

well-kerse, s. [WELL-GRASS.]

well-packing, s. A bag of flaxseed—known as a seedbag—or some other material placed around a well-tube in an oil-well to isolate the oil-bearing strata from water above or below.

well-room, s.

1. A room built over a spring, or to which its waters are conducted, and where they are drunk.
2. A place in the bottom of a boat where the water is collected, and where it is thrown out with a scoop.

well-sinker, s. One who digs or sinks wells.

well-sinking, s. The operation of sinking or digging wells; the act or process of boring for water.

well-spring, s. A source of continual supply.

"Understanding is a well-spring unto him that hath it."—Proverbs xvi. 22.

well-staircase, s. [WELL, s., II. 1.]well-sweep, s. A swape or swipe for a well.well-trap, s. A stink-trap.

well-tube point, s. An auger or spear-point at the bottom end of a perforated tube for a driven well.

well-water, s. The water which flows into a well from subterraneous springs; water drawn from a well.

wēll, *welle, v. i. & t. [A. S. wellan, wyllan.] [WELL, s.]

A. Intrans.: To spring; to issue forth, as water from the earth or a spring; to flow.

"Blood that welled from out the wound."

Dryden: Virgil's Aeneid, x. 1, 184.

B. Trans.: To pass forth, as from a well.

"To her people wealth they forth do well,
And health to every foreign nation."

Spenser: F. Q., II. x. 26.

wēll, wel, adv. & a. [A. S. wel, well, cogn. with Dut. wel; Icel. vel, val; Dan. vel; Sw. väl; Goth. waila; O. H. Ger. wela, wola; Ger. wohl, wol. From the same root as Lat. volo=to wish; Gr. boulomai=to wish; Sansc. vara=better; vara=a wish; vri=to choose; Eng. will, weal, and wealth.]

A. As adverb:

1. In a proper or right manner; justly; not ill or wickedly.

"If thou doest not well, sin lieth at the door."—Genesis: iv. 7.

2. Justly, fairly, excusably, reasonably.

"He might, indeed, well be appalled."—Macaulay: Hist. Eng., ch. ix.

3. In a satisfactory manner; happily, fortunately.

"We prosper well in our return."—Shakesp.: Tempest, ii. 1.

4. Satisfactorily, properly.

"A well proportioned steed."

Shakesp.: Venus and Adonis, 290.

5. To or in a sufficient degree; adequately; fully, perfectly.

"Let us go up at once and possess it; for we are well able to overcome it."—Numbers xiii. 30.

6. Thoroughly, fully; as, Let the cloth be well cleaned.

7. Sufficiently, abundantly, amply.

"The plain of Jordan . . . was well watered everywhere."—Genesis xiii. 10.

8. Very much; greatly; to a degree that gives pleasure.

"I can be well contented."

Shakesp.: Venus and Adonis, 513.

9. Favorably; with praise or commendation.

"All the world speaks well of you."—Pope. (Todd.)

10. Conveniently, suitably, advantageously, easily; as, I cannot well go to-day.

11. Skillfully; with due art; as, The work is well done.

*12. Quite, fully.

Chaucer: C. T., prol. 25.

13. Far; considerably; not a little.

"Abraham and Sarah were old, and well stricken in age."—Genesis xviii. 11.

B. As adjective:

*1. Acting in accordance with right; upright, just.

"The prestis that ben wel gouvernouris."—Wycliffe: I Timothy v.

2. Just, right, proper; as, It was well to do this.

3. In accordance with wish or desire; satisfactory, fortunate; as it should be.

"It was well with us in Egypt."—Numbers xi. 18.

4. Satisfactory.

"To mar the subject that before was well."

Shakesp.: Sonnet 103.

5. Being in health; having a sound body with a regular performance of the natural and proper functions of all the organs; not ailing, diseased, or sick; healthy.

"You look not well."

*8. At rest; free from the cares of the world; happy. (Said of the dead.)

"We used to say the dead are well."

Shakesp.: Antony and Cleopatra, ii. 5.

¶ Well is now always used predicatively; it is therefore frequently difficult to decide when it is used as an adjective and when as an adverb. It is sometimes used substantively, as in the example.

"Well be with you, gentlemen."—Shakesp.: Hamlet, ii. 2.

¶ (1) As well: Rather right, convenient, or proper than otherwise; as, It may be as well to go.

(2) As well as: Together with; one as much as the other.

"Coptos was the magazine of all the trade from Ethiopia, by the Nile, as well as of those commodities that came from the west by Alexandria."—Arbuthnot: On Coins.

* (3) To leave (or let) well alone: To be content with circumstances.

(4) Well enough: In a moderate degree or manner; fairly, satisfactorily, sufficiently well: as, He acted well enough.

* (5) Well to live: Having a competence; well-off.

"His father . . . is well to live."—Shakesp.: Merchant of Venice, ii. 2.

(6) Used elliptically for "It is well," and as an expression of satisfaction, acquiescence, or concession, and sometimes as a mere expletive, or to avoid abruptness: as, Well, it shall be so.

¶ Well is used in combination with many words, principally adjectives and adverbs, to express what is right, fit, laudable, satisfactory, or not defective. The meanings of many of these compounds are sufficiently obvious, as well-designed, well-adjusted, well-directed, &c.

Welwitsch's bat, s.

Zoöl.: Vespertilio († Scotophilus) welwitschii, a bat of variegated colors—brown, orange, yellow, and black—described by Gray from a specimen sent from Angola by Dr. Welwitsch.

wěl-witsch'-i-a (or w as v), s. [Named from its discoverer, Dr. Welwitsch, an African explorer, who died in 1872.]

Bot.: A genus of Gnetaceæ, with but one known species, Welwitschia mirabilis. It rises from the sand in which it grows, putting forth two cotyledonary leaves, which ultimately become about six feet long, or rather more, coriaceous and ragged. No other leaves follow, but the connecting stem increases horizontally both above and below the insertion of the leaves, which it clasps in a marginal slit or cavity. From the upper side of the stem at the base of the leaves there are annually developed several dichotomous stems six inches to a foot high, articulated, and with two small opposite scales at each joint, the several branches terminated by oblong cones. These contain two kinds of flowers, one hermaphrodite and the other female, with naked ovules. To a certain extent the plant connects Gymnosperms with Angiosperms. It grows in sandy deserts in Africa between 14-23° S., and attains a great age; some specimens being estimated as at least one hundred years old.

Welwitschia Mirabilis.

wēre'-wolf, wer-wolf, subst. [A. S. werewolf, from wer=a man, and wulf=a wolf; cogn. with Ger. währwolf; M. H. Ger. werwolf.]

Anthrop.: A person supposed to have the power of transforming himself at certain seasons into a wolf, and assuming all the ferocity of that animal, joined to the practice of disinterring and feeding on dead bodies. [LYCANTHROPIA, LYCANTHROPY.] In Bulgaria the legends of werewolves are inextricably mixed up with those of the vampires [VAMPIRE, A. I. I.], and the same sign—the meeting of the eyebrows, as if the soul were about to take flight to enter some other body—is held to be conclusive evidence that a person belongs to one of these classes.

"The Budas of Abyssinia . . . are at once the smiths and potters, sorcerers and werewolves of their district."—Tylor: Prim. Cult. (ed. 1873), i. 113.

wērke, s. & v. [WORK, s. & v.]

werne, v. t. [WARN.]

Wēr-nēr'-ī-an, a. [See def.] Of or belonging to Abraham Gottlob Werner, one of the founders of geological science. He was born on Sept. 25, 1750, at Weslau on the Queiss, in Upper Lausitz, where his father was superintendent of a foundry. In 1774 Werner published a little work which revolutionized the science of mineralogy and led to his being appointed in 1775 Professor of Mineralogy in the School of Mines at Freiberg. He introduced the geological use of the word "formation," and taught that the exterior of the earth consists of a series of such formations arranged in determinate order. He was the author of the Neptunian Theory or Hypothesis (q. v.). He died on June 30, 1817.

wēr'-nēr'-īte, s. [After the celebrated mineralogist A. G. Werner; suff. -ite (Min.).]

Min.: A name originally given by d'Andrada to some minerals from Norway which subsequently were found to vary in chemical composition, and are now known as the scapolites, wernerite being retained for the name of a member of the group. Crystallization, tetragonal; hardness, 5-6; specific gravity, 2.63-2.8; luster, vitreous when pure, otherwise pearly to resinous; fracture sub-conchoidal. Composition, owing to its liability to alteration, somewhat variable, the mean being: Silica, 48.4; alumina, 28.5; lime, 18.1; soda, 5.0=100, with the formula $(\frac{1}{2}(\text{CaONaO})_3 + \frac{1}{2}\text{Al}_2\text{O}_3)_2 3\text{SiO}_2 + \text{SiO}_2$. Dana includes in this species Nuttallite, Chelmsfordite, and Glaucolite, and as altered forms, Athierastite, Stroganovite, Algerite, Wilsonite, Terenite, Micarelle, and Gabronite (see these words).

Hist.: An assembly of divines, lay assessors, &c., which met in obedience to an ordinance of the Lords and Commons, issued June 12, 1643—

"For the calling of an assembly of learned and godly divines to be consulted with by the Parliament for the settling of the government and liturgy of the Church of England, and for the vindicating and clearing of the doctrine of the said Church from false aspersions and interpretations."

A hundred and twenty clergymen, with ten lords and twenty commoners, or lay assessors, were nominated to carry out the ordinance. The meeting was forbidden by the king on June 22, but no notice was taken of the prohibition. On July 1 sixty-nine of the nominated members attended in Henry VII.'s Chapel in Westminster Abbey, and the assembly began. They sat 1,163 times, their last meeting being on Feb. 22, 1649. On Sept. 15, 1643, commissioners arrived from the Church of Scotland to aid in the deliberations. On April 20, 1643, the Assembly submitted to Parliament a Directory for Public Worship; between Oct. 1 and Nov. 26, 1644, the Confession of Faith, in two portions [CONFESSION, III. 4 (2)]; on Nov. 5, 1647, the Shorter Catechism (q. v.); and on Sept. 15, 1648, the Longer Catechism [The great majority of the members were Presbyterians, a small but active body were Independents, and a yet smaller one, but containing able men, were Erastians. The Parliament itself was Erastian, and, though accepting and ratifying the productions of the Assembly, did not allow the spiritual independence which the majority of its members earnestly desired to obtain. [PRESBYTERIAN.]

1. Zoöl.: The popular name of any species or individual of the modern order Cetacea (the Cetacea Ordinaria of older writers). [CETACEA.] The head is generally large, and in some species constitutes more than one-third of the entire length; mouth always wide, with stiff, immobile lips; fore limbs reduced to flattened fin-like paddles, no external traces of hind limbs, though sometimes the vestige of a femur is present in the shape of a nodule of bone about the size of a walnut. Immediately below the skin is a thick layer of fat, held together by fibrous tissue, constituting the blubber [BLUBBER, s., 2.]; and in nearly all there is a dorsal fin. The eye is small; there is no external ear, but a minute auditory aperture, and the nostrils, which are usually called "blowholes," are situated on the top of the head, except in the Sperm Whale, which has them at the extremity of the snout. Whales are found in all seas, and some, like the Beluga (q. v.), ascend large rivers. All pass their lives in water, and are absolutely helpless on land. They rise frequently to the surface to breathe, and usually expose the highest part of the head where the nostrils are situated. The so-called "spouting" of the whale is only the ordinary act of breathing. When the animal rises to the surface it forcibly expels from the lungs the air taken in at the last previous inspiration, which is of course heated and loaded with watery vapor. As this rapidly condenses when expelled, it forms a column of spray, which has been erroneously assumed to be water taken in by the mouth and ejected by the nostrils. In hunting the whale the harpoon may pierce the lungs or air passages, and then a column of blood may be forced high in the air through the nostrils, but—making due allowance for the different methods of breathing—similar result follows wounds in the respiratory organs of other mammals. All the Cetacea prey on living food of some kind—chiefly fish, small floating crustacea, pteropods, and squids. The genus Orca alone attacks and devours other warm-blooded animals, such as seals and individuals of its own order. Whales are for the most part timid, inoffensive animals, active and affectionate, especially the cows toward their calves, of which they produce but one, or rarely two, at a time. They generally swim in herds, or "schools," though some species have been met with singly or in pairs. In size they differ greatly; some of the Delphinidae are only about four feet in length, while the gigantic Sperm-whale, or Cachalot (q. v.), reaches some fifty feet, which appears to be never greatly exceeded in this species, though stories are told of animals nearly double as long, and Balenoptera sibbaldii, probably the largest living whale, attains the length of eighty feet. Popularly the name is used in a more restricted sense than that in which it is employed scientifically. The members of the Platanistidae and Delphinidae are called Freshwater Dolphins and True Dolphins respectively, though the Pilot-whale, the Beluga, or White Whale, and the Narwhal belong to the latter family. The great commercial value of the oil which all the Cetacea yield, and the special products of some—whalebone, spermaceti, ivory—subject them to relentless persecution, which has vastly diminished their numbers. "It is maintained that the present wholesale slaughter carried out by Norwegian and Russian steamers, equipped with harpoon guns, will eventually extirpate these animals, and some measure for their preservation is contemplated." The Right Whale, or Greenland Whale (Balæna mysticetus), the chief object of pursuit of the whalers, is confined to the Arctic regions. It was formerly thought to extend to the Antarctic circle, but the Cape or Southern Whale (B. australis) is now generally admitted to specific distinction. The former is from sixty to seventy feet long, velvety black above, with the lower parts white; the latter somewhat smaller and of a uniform black. Other species are the Biscay Whale (B. biscayensis), the object of a fishery by the Basques down to the end of the eighteenth century; the Japan whale (B. japonica), and the South Pacific whale (B. antipodarum). They are exceedingly alike in habit, and they do not differ greatly in appearance. [HUMPBACKED-WHALES, PHYSETER, II., RORQUAL, ZEUGLON.]

2. Script.: The rendering of Gr. kētos=any sea monster or large fish, in Matt. xii. 40, in the A. V., and in the text (not the margin) of the R. V. It was taken from the Septuagint of Jonah ii. 1, 11. The Hebrew has simply dag gadhol=great fish; probably the White Shark (q. v.).

"To show his teeth as white as whale's bone."

Shakesp.: Love's Labor's Lost, v. 2.

whāle, v. t. [A variant of wale (q. v.).] To lash with stripes; to thrash, to beat, to whack.

whāle'-bäck, s. [Eng. whale, s., and back.] The name of a new form of steam-vessel invented by Capt. Alexander McDougall, of West Superior, Wisconsin, in 1874. The name whaleback was suggested by the resemblance of the visible portions of the vessel, when afloat, to the back of a whale. Capt. McDougall's idea was to build a vessel of steel with top-sides and erections rounded in such form as would reduce the resistance to both wind and water to a minimum. The spoon-bow is, also, one of the greatest features of the whaleback

Whale back steamer "101."

design, as it gives such an easy entrance; and, instead of cleaving the water, rides over it. The vessels are constructed after the ordinary model in the bottom, with double bottom for water ballast, but the frames are continuous from center line of keel to center line of deck, thus making the deck and sides much stronger than the deck and top-sides of an ordinary vessel. The hatches are so arranged as to give back the full strength to the hull when the hatch plates are bolted on, a feature that the ordinary type of vessel lacks, as there is simply an opening covered with wood and the strength is not renewed. From the "101," the first vessel of the whaleback model that was built, down to the "Christopher Columbus," about forty vessels of this type have been constructed, and designs are already out for vessels for the transatlantic passenger business. A number of tow-barges and freight steamers have been built, some of which are in use on the Atlantic coast. It is also believed that this style of vessel is well adapted for warships.

whāle'-bone, s. [Eng. whale, s., and bone.] A horny substance, occurring in long, thin plates, fringed at the edges, and acting as a strainer to detain the whale's food when the animal ejects the water which it has swallowed with the medusæ and small fry which constitute its food. The principal source of whalebone is the "right whale," so called, the Balæna mysticetus or australis. Some 300 of the plates are found in the mouth of an adult whale, and vary from ten to fifteen feet in length. Being very flexible, strong, elastic, and light, whalebone is employed for many purposes, as for ribs to umbrellas and parasols, for stiffening ladies' corsets, &c. Also, and more properly, called baleen.

A. As pronoun:

(1) Substantively:

"What seest thou in the ground?"

Shakesp.: Venus and Adonis, 118.

(2) Adjectively:

"What great danger dwells upon my suit?"

Shakesp.: Venus and Adonis, 206.

2. Used absolutely in introducing a question emphatically, or somewhat in the manner of an interjection, and equivalent to "Do you mean to say that?" "Can it be that?" or the like.

"What, could ye not watch with me one hour?"—Matthew xxvi. 40.

3. Used to introduce an intensive or emphatic phrase or exclamation.

(1) Adjectively = how great! how extraordinary! how remarkable!

"What a sight it was!"

Shakesp.: Venus and Adonis, 343.

(2) Adverbially = to what a degree! to what an extent! how greatly! how remarkably!

"What fine change is in the music!"

Shakesp.: Two Gentlemen, iv. 2.

4. Having the force of a compound relative pronoun.

(1) Substantively = the thing (or things) which, that which.

"Controlling what he was controlled with."

Shakesp.: Venus and Adonis, 270.

(2) Adjectively = the . . . which, the sort of thing . . . which, such . . . as.

"What strength I have is mine own."

Shakesp.: Tempest. (Epilogue.)

(3) Referring to a preceding substantive = that (or those) which, such as.

"Draw no swords but what are sanctified."

Shakesp.: Henry IV., Pt. II., iv. 4.

5. Used for who, but only in the predicate.

"What is this maid?"—Shakesp.: Tempest, v.

6. What thing or person soever; whatever or whoever, whatsoever or whosoever.

"Be what thou wilt, thou art my prisoner."

Shakesp.: Henry VI., Pt. I., v. 3.

7. Partly by; partly in consequence of. (Now always followed by with.)

"What with the war, what with the sweat, what with the gallows, and what with poverty, I am custom-shrunk."—Shakesp.: Measure for Measure, i. 2.

8. Used elliptically, in certain phrases, as—

(1) What if = what would be the consequence if? what will it matter if? what would you say if?

"What if this mixture do not work at all?"

Shakesp.: Romeo and Juliet, iv. 3.

(2) What of = what follows from? why do you mention? what is the matter with?

"All this is so, but what of this, my lord?"

Shakesp.: Much Ado, iv. 1.

¶ In the expression, What of the night? (Isa. xxi. 11) there is an ellipsis of the word "part," so that the inquiry is, What remains of the night? How much of it is past? The Vulgate, however (Quid de nocte?) follows the commoner but less correct interpretation, What tidings as to the state of the night?

(3) Hence, What of that? = no matter, never mind.

"The night is spent, why, what of that?"

Shakesp.: Venus and Adonis, 717.

(4) What though = what does it matter though? granting or supposing that; admitting that.

"What though care killed a cat?"—Shakesp.: Much Ado, v. 1.

*¶ Also used alone = no matter, never mind, it is all one.

"But what though! courage!"

Shakesp.: As You Like It, iii. 3.

9. In such obsolete or poetical phrases as what time, what day, what hour, &c., what = at the time, day, &c., when.

"I made thee miserable,

What time I threw the people's suffrages

On him." Shakesp.: Titus Andronicus, iv. 3.

10. In such phrases as I'll tell you what, &c., what either anticipates the succeeding statement, or is used to lay some stress on what is about to be stated, and not as of merely introducing a clause communicating information.

B. As adverb:

1. For what purpose; why.

2. In or to a certain degree.

C. As substantive:

1. Something, thing, stuff.

"Come downe, and learne the little what,

That Thomalin can saine."

Spenser: Shepherd's Calendar; July.

2. A certain quantity.

"Then the kynge anone called his seruante, that hadde but one lofe and a lytell whatte of wyne."—Fabyan: Chronycle, ch. clxxii.

¶ (1) To know what's what: To know the nature of things; to have a sufficient knowledge, judgment, or experience; to be knowing. (Slang.) (Udall: Roister Doister, i. 2.)

* (2) What else? (elliptical for What else can be?): A phrase formerly used as a strong affirmative, as if equivalent to "Could you imagine anything else to be the case?"

(3) What ho! An exclamation of calling.

(4) What not? A term used in concluding an enumeration of several articles, or particulars, and forming an abbreviated or elliptical clause, generally equivalent to "What may I not add or mention?" "et cetera."

(5) What's his (its) name? What do you call it? &c.: Colloquial phrases, generally used to signify that the speaker cannot supply a definite name for some person or thing, or that the name has slipped his memory, or that the person or thing is of so trivial consequence as not to be deserving of a specific name. The phrase is often formed into a compound, as, Tell Mr. What's-his-name to come.

what-cheer, s. The watchword or shibboleth of the people of Rhode Island. It is derived from the fact that the Indians of that state thus greeted the founder of the colony, Roger Williams, as he and his companions landed from a canoe on Sekonk River, near the present site of the city of Providence.

Bot.: Triticum vulgare, an annual cereal grass, possessing a four-cornered imbricated spike, with four-flowered spikelets, having their valves ventricose, ovate, truncate, mucronate, compressed under the apex, the nerve somewhat prominent. Its native country is not known, but has been supposed to be Persia or Siberia. The plant may have been so altered by cultivation as now to be very different from the parent. Fabre and Prof. Buckman think that it may have been developed from Egilops (q. v.), a genus allied to Triticum, though Henfrey objects to this identification. Wheat was cultivated from an early period in Egypt and the neighboring countries [2.], as also by the Greeks, the Romans, &c. Now it has spread over a great part of the world, flourishing in climates considerably differing from each other. Two leading sub-species or marked varieties exist, viz., Triticum aestivum, and T. hybernum. There are also many sub-varieties. It is cultivated for its grain, which, after the removal of the husks, is ground into flour. It is liable to be attacked by minute fungals, the larvæ of certain midges (see the compounds), and a little worm (Anguillula tritici).

¶ 1. Wheat and Indian: A mixture of wheat flour and Indian Maize meal made into bread.

2. The world's wheatfields: The following figures based on the latest returns of the United States Department of Agriculture show the approximate wheat crop of the world for any year of the decade 1888 to 1898: United States, 4 2,000,000 bushels; Canada, 51,075,000; Argentina, 36,888,000; Chile, 15,181,000; Austria, 52,683,862; Hungary, 135,896,905; France, 269,562,000; Italy, 109,420,870; Germany, 108,307,500; Great Britain, 79,178,632; Russia, 387,035,000; Spain, 104,343,316; Turkey in Europe, 23,375,000; Bulgaria, 29,794,000; Belgium, 21,281,000; British India, 180,000,000; Asia Minor, 316,098,000; Australasia, 24,402,000. The world, 2,390,035,085 bushels. The greatest wheat-producing district of North America is the North Western section of the United States (east of the Rocky Mountains) and Manitoba, the soil and climate of the North Western States, particularly Minnesota and the Dakotas, being especially adapted to its successful cultivation, although it is raised with considerable success in many other localities.

wheat-barley, s. [NAKED-BARLEY.]

wheat-drill, s. [GRAIN-DRILL.]

wheāt-ear, s. An ear of wheat.

wheat-eel, s. A disease in wheat, called also Ear-cockle and Purples.

wheat-fly, s.

Entom.: Cecidomyia tritici; a yellow and orange colored two-winged fly, about a tenth of an inch long, with black eyes, the female of which deposits her eggs in the heart of the wheat blossom. These eggs soon give exit to yellow or orange-colored larvæ, popularly known as red maggots, which feed on the reproductive organs of the plant, preventing the seed from coming to perfection. When full-grown they descend the stem, and undergo their transformation into the chrysalis state in the earth.

wheat-grass, s.

Bot.: Various species of Triticum (q. v.).

wheat-midge, s.

Entomology:

1. Cecidomyia tritici. [WHEAT-FLY.]

Bot.: Puccinia graminis. [RUST, s., II.]

wheat-moth, s.

Entom.: The grain-moth (q. v.).

wheat-starch, s.

Micros.: The starch or flour of wheat, frequently used in the adulteration of mustard, pepper, &c. It can be readily identified by the microscope, the larger granules being round and slightly flattened on one side, the smaller ones, when examined by a high power, being distinctly angular. Each granule has a hilum, or central spot, and many of the larger ones exhibit faintly marked concentric rings.

Wheat-starch. (Magnified 100 diameters.)

whēat'-ēar, s. [Etym. doubtful. Some connect the name with A. S. hwæt=keen, a supposed keenness of hearing being suggested by the decided markings of the feathers near the auditory apertures. Halliwell gives Linc. whitter=to complain. Smollett (Travels, lett. iii.) says the name is corrupted from white-arse, which is supported by the French name cul blanc, and the English names White-tail, White-rump.]

Ornith.: Saxicola oenanthe; called also the Fal-low-chat and Fal-low-finch. A well-known European singing-bird. Length about six inches; upper parts light silver-gray, with patch of white on rump; quill-feathers, coverts, middle tail-feathers, and tips of rectrices (which are white), deep black; black streak from edge of beak to ear, enveloping the eye and spreading to ear-coverts; breast, orange-buff; belly, white.

C. As subst.: Coaxing, flattering, cajoling.

"By murmur'ing, wheedling, stratagem, and force."

Pope: Wife of Bath, 163.

whēēd'-līng-lŷ, adv. [English wheeling; -ly.] In a wheeling manner; with coaxing or flattery.

"Can't you do nothing for him?" she said wheedlingly."—J. S. Le Fanu: In a Glass Darkly, i. 243.

whēēl, weol, wheele, s. [A. S. hweōl, hweohl, hweowol; cogn. with Dut. wiel; Icel. hjól; Dan. hjul; Sw. hjul.]

I. Ordinary Language:

1. A circular frame or solid disc turning on an axis. The essential feature of a wheel is rotation, partial or entire. Its motion may be intermittent, oscillatory, or continuous. Its form may be circular or otherwise; its contour regular or irregular. Its function may be to transmit motion or to modify it. Its application may necessitate cogs of a given form, or it may be smooth, its surface being free from contact with other portions of the machine. It may be hollow, for the conveyance or measurement of fluids; or it may be the means of propulsion of fluids; or conversely it may be propelled by them. It may form a support, and, by rotation, be made effective in assisting transportation. As used for vehicles, the wheel has a wooden or cast-iron hub (nave), wrought-iron tire, and wrought-iron or wooden spokes. The felly has holes flaring to the outside, so as to hold the ends of the spokes, which have heads to fit the openings. The inner ends of the spokes pass through the outer rim of the hub, and when of iron are secured by nuts. The insertion of the spokes in circles near the ends of the hubs gives them an extended base or bearing, and strengthens the wheel against lateral strain. Wheels receive different names according to the purpose for which they are used; as, balance-wheel, cog-wheel, crown-wheel, fly-wheel, paddle-wheel, pinion-wheel, scape-wheel, tread-wheel, turbine, &c., which will be found described under their respective heads.

2. A machine for spinning yarn or thread; a spinning-wheel (q. v.).

3. In the same sense as II. 1.

4. An apparatus, machine, instrument, or other object having a wheel-like shape, or the essential feature of which is a wheel; as—

(1) The revolving disc used by potters in modeling; a potter's wheel.

(2) An instrument of torture formerly used for criminals of the most atrocious class. In some places it consisted of a carriage-wheel, on which the criminal was placed with his face upward, and his legs and arms extended along the spokes. On the wheel being moved round, the executioner broke the victim's limbs by successive blows with a hammer or iron bar, and after a more or less protracted interval put an end to his sufferings by two or three severe blows, called coups de grâce (mercystrokes) on the chest or stomach, or by strangling him. In Germany its use lingered down to the commencement of the nineteenth century.

"Let them pull all about mine ears, present me Death on the wheel, or at wild horses' heels."

Shakesp.: Coriolanus, iii. 2.

* (3) A circular body, a disc, an orb.

* (4) A carriage, a chariot.

"A carbuncle of Phœbus' wheel."

Shakesp.: Cymbeline, v. 5.

(5) A bicycle.

"Gen. Brooke was pleased with the demonstration of the utility of the wheel for courier purposes and will recommend it to the War Department and advocate a special corps of bicycle riders for each department."—Chicago Record.

¶ 5. A circular motion; a revolution; rotation, circumgyration.

"According to the common vicissitude and wheel of things, the proud and the insolent, after long trampling upon others, come at length to be trampled upon themselves."—South.

6. One of the attributes of Fortune as the emblem of mutability.

"The giddy round of Fortune's wheel."

Shakesp.: Henry V., iii. 6.

* 7. The burden or refrain of a ballad.

"You must sing a-down, a-down,
An you call him a-down-a.
O, how the wheel becomes it!"

Shakesp.: Hamlet, iv. 5.

II. Technically:

1. Naut.: A tiller-wheel; a steering-wheel (q. v.).
2. Pyrotechnics: A firework of a circular shape, which, while burning, revolves on an axis by the action of the escaping gas.

¶ 1. To break upon the wheel: To subject to the punishment described under WHEEL, s., I. 4. (2).

2. To break a fly (butterfly, &c.) on the wheel:

(1) To subject to a punishment out of all proportion to the gravity of the offense and importance of the offender.

(2) To employ great means or exertions for trifling ends.

3. To put one's shoulder to the wheel: [SHOULDER, subst.].

4. Wheel and axle: A modification of the lever (q. v.), and one of the mechanical powers. Its most simple form is a cylindrical axle, on which a concentric wheel is firmly fastened, the whole being suspended horizontally. When this power is employed to raise heavy weights, the weight is attached to a rope wound round the axle, and the power applied to a rope placed in the grooved rim of the wheel, or to a handle fixed at right angles to the rim of the wheel, for which an ordinary winch may be substituted. From the diagram it will be seen that this machine is a lever, the extremities of which are not points as in the normal form [LEVER, s.], but the circumference of the circles (the wheel and the axle), whose radii are C A, C B respectively. Hence the power and the weight are not attached to particular points in these circumferences, but to cords wound round them; and the imaginary simple lever A B (formed by joining the points A, B, where the cords become tangents to the circles) remains unaltered in position and magnitude. The conditions of equilibrium are that $P \times C A = W \times C B$; or, since the circumferences of circles are proportional to their radii, that $P : W ::$ circumference of the axle : the circumference of the wheel (or, if a winch is employed, the circumference of the revolution described by the power).

"So fine, so round, and even a thread she [the spider] spins, hanging thereunto herself, and using the weight of her owne bodie instead of a whereve."—P. Holland: Pliny, bk. xi., ch. xxiv.

whêt', whette, whet-ten, v. t. [A. S. hwettan = to sharpen, from hwat = keen, bold, brave, from O. Sax. hwat = sharp, keen; cogn. with Dut. wetten = to sharpen; Icel. hvetja = to sharpen, to encourage, from hvatr = bold, active, vigorous; Sw. vättja = to whet; Ger. wetzen; O. H. Ger. hwazan, from hwas = sharp.]

1. Literally:

(1) To sharpen; to make sharp by rubbing on a stone or similar substance.

"The bows they bend, and the knives they whet."

Scott: Lady of the Lake, iv. 25.

(2) To rub with or on a stone or similar substance for the purpose of sharpening.

(3) To sharpen generally.

"Here roams the wolf, the eagle whets his beak."

Byron: Childe Harold, ii. 42.

2. Figuratively:

(1) To make sharp, keen, or eager; to excite, to stimulate.

"The usual prefaces amongst such people to whet each other's courage."—Clarendon: Religion and Policy, ch. ix.

* (2) To provoke; to make angry or acrimonious.

A. As pron.: Which of two; which one of two. (Used interrogatively and relatively.)

"Whether of those twain did the will of his father?"—Matthew xxi. 31.

B. As adj.: Which of two.

"And so wrought,

That when the father him bethought,

And sighe to whether side it drough."

Gower: C. A., ii.

C. As conjunction:

*1. Used as the sign of a question.

"Whether is not this the sone of a carpenter?"—Wycliffe: Matthew xiii.

2. Which of two or more alternatives; used to introduce the first of a series of alternative clauses, the succeeding clause or clauses being connected by or or by whether.

"Thou shalt speak my words unto them, whether they will hear, or whether they will forbear."—Ezekiel, ii. 7.

¶ (1) Sometimes the correlative clause is simply a negative.

"You have said; but whether wisely or no, let the forest judge."—Shakesp.: As You Like It, iii. 2.

(2) In many cases, where the second of two alternatives is the mere negative of the first, the second is omitted, and whether stands without any correlative, and has simply the force of if.

¶ Whether or no: In either alternative; as, I will go whether or no.

whêth'-êr', adv. [WHITHER.]

whêth'-êr-ing, s. [Etym. doubtful.] The retention of the after-birth in cows.

whêt'-île, s. [See def.]

Ornith.: A woodpecker (q. v.).

"In some counties a Woodpecker is called a 'Whetile,' and in others a 'Woodwale,'—two words which seem to have the same derivation. The first has been supposed to be merely a corruption of whittle—a knife—formerly written 'whytel'; but a still more ancient form of this word is 'thwitel,' which renders the conjecture very unlikely. On the other hand, 'Woodwale,' or 'Woodwall,' may be traced from 'Witwall,' as found in Hollyband's Dictionary—cognate with the Low-Dutch Weedwael, and the Old-German Wittevaal . . . of which Whetile is but an easy corruption; and it is certain that, whatever the second syllable may mean, the first is only wood—in old Anglo-Saxon widu . . . In some form or other the word occurs not unfrequently in old poems."—Yarrell: Brit. Birds (ed. 4th), ii. 461, 462.

whêt'-sâw, s. [Eng. whet, and saw.]

Ornith.: Sitta canadensis, the white-breasted nuthatch.

whêt'-slâte, subst. [Eng. whet, verb, and slate.] [WHETSTONE, II.]

whêt'-stône, s. [A. S. hwatstân.] [WHET, v.]

I. Ordinary Language:

1. Lit.: A piece of stone, usually a rectangular slab, used for sharpening cutlery or tools. Scythe-stones are bellied, and taper toward the ends. Many varieties of stone, especially of the slaty kinds, are more or less perfectly adapted for the purpose. Some, however, are peculiarly suited for imparting a fine edge to tools, command a high price, and are generally used in the workshop as oilstones.

"I'd rather, I,

Be like a whetstone, that an edge can put

On steel, though't self be dull and cannot cut."

Ben Jonson: Horace; Art of Poetry.

2. Fig.: Anything which sharpens, excites, or stimulates.

II. Petrol.: A siliceous clay-slate, compact and of homogeneous texture. Used for sharpening edge-tools. Called also Whetslate and Whetstone-slate.

¶ To give the whetstone, To deserve the whetstone: Old phrases, in which the whetstone is associated with lying, and regarded as the proper premium for accomplishment in that art.

whetstone-slate, s. [WHETSTONE, II.]

whêt'-têr, s. [Eng. whet, v.; -er.]

1. One who or that which whets, sharpens, or stimulates.

whîch, whîlk, wich, wuch, whiche, wiche, pron. [A. S. hwilc, hwelc, hwylc, a contracted form of hwilic=why-like, from hwt, hwý=why (from hwd=who), and lic=like; cogn. with O. Sax. hwilik, from hwi=why, and lik=like; O. Fries. hwelik, hwelk, hwek; Dut. welk; Icel. hwilkr=of what kind, from hvi, instrumental case of hverr=who, and likr=like; Dan. hwilken (masc.), hwilket (neut.); Sw. hwilken, hwilket; Ger. welcher; O. H. Ger. hwelik, from hweo=how, and lik=like; Goth. hweleiks, from hwe, instrumental case of hwas=who, and leiks=like; Lat. qualis=of what sort. As an interrogative pronoun, which is used of any gender, but as a relative it is now only neuter.]

1. An interrogative pronoun, by which one or more out of a number of persons or things, frequently one out of two, is inquired for or is desired to be pointed out or definitely described.

"Which of you convinceth me of sin?"—John viii. 46.

2. A relative pronoun, serving as the neuter of who, and having as its antecedent one or more persons or things. It is now confined to things; such expressions as "Our father which art in heaven" being now obsolete. Sometimes the antecedent is a clause or sentence; as, He is ill, which I am sorry for.

3. Used adjectively, or with a noun, the relative coming before the noun.

"What! whilke way is he gone? he gan to me."

Chaucer: C. T., 4,076.

4. Used as an indefinite pronoun, standing for whichever, any one which, that which, those which, or the like; as, Take which you please.

¶ (1) Which was formerly frequently preceded by the.

"Do they not blaspheme that worthy name by the which ye are called?"—James ii. 7.

(2) Which was formerly sometimes followed by as or that, with the effect of emphasis or definiteness.

(3) It was also sometimes followed by the indefinite article.

"I shall him tellen whiche a gret honor it is."

Chaucer: C. T., 6,875.

(4) Which is which: Which is the one and which is the other. A phrase commonly used to denote inability to distinguish between two persons or things.

(5) Which sometimes had whose as its genitive.

"Of man's first disobedience, and the fruit Of that forbidden tree, whose mortal taste Brought death into the world."

Milton: P. L., i. 2.

whîch-ëv'-ër, whîch-sô-ëv'-ër, pron. [English which; -ever, -soever.] Whether one or the other; no matter which. (Used both as an adjective and a noun; as, Take whichever road you please; whichever of the roads he takes.)

†whîck'-en, s. [WICKEN.]

whîd, s. [Etym. doubtful. Cf. Welsh chwid = a quick turn.]

1. The motion of a hare running but not frightened.

2. A lie. (Burns: Death and Dr. Hornbook.)

whîd, v. i. [WHID.] (Scotch.)

1. To whisk; to move nimbly.

"An' morning poussie whiddin' seen."

Burns: To J. Lapraik.

2. To lie, to fib.

whî-dâh, whî-dâh, s. [Native name.]

Geog.: A maritime province of Dahomey, on the Bight of Benin.

whidah-bird, whydah-bird, s.

Ornith.: The Widow-bird (Vidua paradisæa), or Broad-shafted Whidah-bird, from equatorial West Africa. Male black on head, back, and tail; brilliant red upon the nape and lower parts of the body; female brownish-yellow on head, breast and borders of wings rose color. Length of body about five inches, tail eleven inches; female somewhat smaller. The song is simple but pleasing, and these birds are brought to Europe in considerable numbers and sold as cage birds. They are generally called by dealers Birds of Paradise, and sometimes Paradise Widow-birds. Used in a wider sense of any species of the genus Vidua (q. v.). The name Widow-bird, or Widow, is also applied with a qualifying epithet to allied genera; the species of Colius passer being popularly known as Mourning Widows, and the single species of Chera (Chera caffra) as the Long-tailed Widow-bird.

Ornithology:

1. The Whidah-bird (q. v.).

"The bird on the wing is the whydah-finch, remarkable for the enormous plumes with which the tail of the male bird is decorated during the breeding season."—Wallace: Geog. Dist. Animals, i. 264.

2. Any species of the genus Vidua, consisting of tropical and South African finches, with long wings and a boat-shaped tail, the two middle feathers of which become excessively lengthened in the male in the breeding season and drop off when incubation is over. Most of the species seek their food on the ground, generally subsisting on grass seeds and insects; but they pass a considerable portion of the breeding season among the branches of trees, as affording the most convenient situation for the bestowal of their abnormally long tails, while some are found inhabiting the reedy parts of the continent in the neighborhood of great rivers. Their nests closely resemble those of the Weaver-birds. The best known species are the Vidua paradisæa [WIDOW-BIRD], and V. erythrorynchus, the Red-billed Whidah-finch, which is somewhat smaller.

whid-er-ward, adv. [WHITHERWARD.]

whiff, weffe, s. [An imitative word. Cf. puff, pipe, &c.; cogn. with Welsh chwiff=a whiff, a puff; chwifis=to puff; chwaff=a gust; Dan. vift=a puff, a gust; Ger. piff-paff, used to denote a sudden, explosive sound.]

I. Ordinary Language:

1. A sudden explosion of smoke, or the like, from the mouth; a puff.

"The skipper he blew a whiff from his pipe,

And a scornful laugh laughed he."

Longfellow: Wreck of the Hesperus.

2. A short blast or gust of air; a gust of air conveying some smell.

"A whiff

Of stale debauch, forth issuing from the sties

That Law has licensed." Cowper: Task, iv. 459.

3. A hasty view; a glimpse. (Prov.)

4. A name used at Oxford and other places on the Thames for a light kind of outrigger boat. It is timber-built throughout, thus differing from a skiff, which is a racing-boat, usually of cedar, and covered with canvas for some distance at the bow and stern.

II. Ichthy.: [MARY-SOLE.]

whîff, v. t. [WHIFF, s.]

1. To puff; to emit in puffs or whiffs.

2. To consume in whiffs; to smoke.

1. To veer about as the wind does.

"If the winds whiffle about to the south."—Dampier: Disc. of Winds, ch. vi.

*2. To change from one opinion or course to another; to use evasions; to prevaricate; to be fickle and unsteady.

"For, just as int'rest whiffled on his mind,

He Anatolians left, or Thracians join'd."

Harte: Eulogius.

*3. To drink, to quaff.

*B. Transitive:

1. To disperse with a whiff or puff; to blow away; to scatter, to dissipate.

"Whiffle away these truths."—More.

2. To shake or wave quickly.

whîf'-fle, subst. [A dimin. from whiff, s. (q. v.).] A fife or small flute.

whiffle-tree, s. A bar to which the traces of an animal's harness are connected, and whereby the vehicle is drawn; a whipple-tree. The terms single, double, and treble tree are more convenient, and expressive of their capacity.

whîf'-flêr, s. [Eng. whiffle, s.; -er.]

1. One who whiffles; one who frequently changes his opinions or course; one who uses shifts or evasions in arguments; a fickle or unsteady person; a trifler.

2. A piper or fifer.

3. A wand-bearer to head a procession; an officer who led the way in processions, and who cleared the way by blowing a horn or trumpet; any person who led the way in a procession.

"Whiffers originally headed armies or processions as fifers or pipers; in process of time the word whiffers, which had always been used in the sense of a fifer, came to signify any person who went before in a procession."—Douce: Illustrations of Shakespeare.

¶ Hence, a harbinger of any kind. (See extract under SHOEING-HORN, II. 1.)

whîf-flîng-pîn, subst. [Eng. whiff(e); -ing, and pin.] A game played with a plate or circular disk which is made to revolve on edge, and the player whose name is called by the spinner must catch the plate before it ceases to revolve.

whîg (1), s. [WHEY.]

*1. Acidulated whey, sometimes mixed with buttermilk and sweet herbs, used as a cooling beverage. (Prov.)

"With leeks and onions, whig and whey."

Breton: Works of a Young Wit.

2. Whey. (Scotch.)

whîg (2), whîgg, s. & a. [For etym. see extract.]

A. As substantive:

Eng. Hist.: A term applied to the members of one of the great political parties in Great Britain. Originally it was a Scottish term, and appears to have been first used in Scotland in the reign of Charles I., and in England in that of Charles II. According to Bishop Burnet's account (Own Times, bk. i.) of the origin of the word:

"The south-west counties of Scotland have seldom corn enough to serve them all the year round, and the northern parts producing more than they used, those in the west went in summer to buy at Leith the stores that came from the north. From the word whiggam, used in driving their horses, all that drove were called the whiggamors, contracted into whigs. Now in the year before the news came down of duke Hamilton's defeat, the ministers animated their people to rise and march to Edinburgh; and they came up, marching on the head of their parishes, with an unheard-of fury, praying and preaching all the way as they came. The marquis of Argyle and his party came and headed them, they being about 6,000. This was called the 'Whiggamors' Inroad'; and ever after that all who opposed the court came in contempt to be called whigs."

From Scotland the term was transferred to England, and was applied to the political party opposed to the Tories. It was first assumed as a party name by those who were chiefly instrumental in placing William III. on the throne. As a political term it has now almost fallen out of use, being superseded by the term Liberal, the more extreme members of which party have assumed the name of Radicals. [LIBERAL, RADICAL, TORY, WHIGAMORE.] Another explanation is generally given—as, for instance, by Macaulay—that Whig was derived from wheg=whey [WHIG (1), 2.], and was intended to stigmatize the temper of the Covenanters soured by oppression. Skeat considers this incorrect, and accepts Burnet's Etymology, as given in the extract above.

U. S. History: The name Whig was first applied in this country to the supporters of the cause of the colonies against the English King in the war for independence. The name was doubtless applied to the opponents of the king, from the fact that in England the same name was applied to the opposers of the royal prerogative in the time of James II., who were ultimately successful in unseating that monarch. After the revolution had been successfully accomplished the name Whig disappeared from politics, and the people of the country divided into Federalists and Democrats. The party platform of both parties, being gradually altered to meet existing exigencies, the name Federalist was dropped and the term Whig again resuscitated and applied to the opponents of the Democratic party. This name was retained until the agitation of the slavery question induced the formation of a new party, advocating the abolition of slavery and composed Shakesp.: Timon, v. 1.

8. To beat into a froth, as eggs, cream, &c., with a whisk, fork, spoon, or the like.

9. To fish by casting a line on a stream. [FLY-FISHING.]

10. To beat, to overcome, to surpass. (Amer. slang.)

*11. To sew slightly; to form into gathers; as, to whip a ruffle.

12. To sew over and over, as the two selvages of stuffs stitched together.

II. Naut.: To hoist or purchase by means of a rope passed through a single pulley.

B. Intransitive:

1. To move or turn nimbly; to start suddenly and run; to turn and run.

"In fight he sets up his taile, and whips about, turning his taile to the enemy."—P. Holland: Pliny, bk. viii., ch. xxiv.

2. (See extract.)

"She and Scully robbed a sailor in Devonshire street, and Scully was guilty of what is known in Billingsgate as whipping—that is, being interpreted, keeping part of the plunder."—Pall Mall Gazette, Feb. 1, 1888.

¶ 1. To whip in:

(1) Intransitive:

(a) To act as whipper-in (q. v.).

"Also, whipped-in for some time to the Bedale."—Field, Nov. 19, 1887.

(b) To come last.

"—whipped-in, and to the astonishment of every one an extraordinary stand was made."—London Daily Telegraph.

(2) Trans.: To keep from scattering, as hounds in a hunt; hence, to bring or keep the members of a party together, as in a legislative assembly.

2. To whip off: To drive hounds off a scent.

"The difficult nature of the covert, and the fact that they were running in view, prevented hounds from being whipped off at the outset."—Field, April 4, 1885.

3. To whip the cat:

(1) To practice the most pinching parsimony. (Prov.)

(2) To work from house to house by the day, as a tailor, dressmaker, carpenter, or the like. (Prov.)

"Mr. Hugh Haliburton dilates upon the custom of 'whipping the cat'—i. e., working for people at their houses, as was once the wont of Scottish tailors. A minister who fills another's pulpit (for a consideration) is equally said to 'flog pouss.'"—St. James's Gazette, May 12, 1888.

4. To whip the devil around the stump: To prevaricate or circumlocute.

whip, whippe, s.

I. Ordinary Language:

1. An instrument used for driving horses and other animals, or for correction; commonly consisting of a handle, a thong of plaited leather, and a lash of plaited hemp or other fiber. Frequently, however, the handle and thong are in one piece, forming a tapering, flexible rod; riding-whips are made in this way.

"To thy speed add wings,
Lest with a whip of scorpions I pursue Thy ling'ring."—Milton: P. L., ii. 701.

2. A coachman, or driver of a carriage.

"None of the London whips . . . wear wigs now."—Sheridan: Rivals, i. 1.

3. A whipper-in.

"The first whip was unlucky in meeting with a nasty accident some two or three weeks back."—Field, Oct. 15, 1887.

4. An endless line, used in saving life from a wreck.

"The whip passes rapidly toward the wreck, and arriving there the sailors make fast the tail-block in accordance with the directions on the tally-board, and show a signal to the shore."—Scribner's Magazine, Jan. 1880, p. 330.

5. A flag used for signaling.

6. The arm of a windmill, on which a sail is extended; also the length of the arm reckoned from the shaft.

II. Technically:

1. Nautical: A form of hoisting-tackle. A single whip is the most simple purchase in use. If the fall of the rope of a single whip be spliced round the block of another whip, it becomes whip on whip, or whip and runner. Thus two single blocks afford the same purchase as a tackle having a double and a single block, with much less friction.

2. Parliamentary:

(1) A member who performs the important duties of looking after the interests of his party, and who secures the attendance of as many members as possible at an important division.

"The Liberal whips have issued a somewhat similar invitation."—Pall Mall Gazette.

(2) A call made upon the members of a party to attend in their places at a certain time, as when an important division is expected.

"Urgent whips have been issued by both sides."—Pall Mall Gazette.

*¶ Used as an exclamation=immediately.

"You are no sooner chose in, but, whip! you are as proud as the devil."—Centlivre: Gotham Election.

¶ (1) To whip with six strings: [SIX, ¶ (2)].

(2) Whip and derry:

Mining: An arrangement for raising the kibble, by means of a rope merely passing over a pulley and attached to a horse.

(3) Whip and runner: [WHIP, s., II. 1.]

(4) Whip and spur: With the greatest haste.

"Each staunch polemick Came whip and spur, and dash'd thro' thin and thick."

Whip-poor-Will, s.

Ornith.: Caprimulgus (antrostomus) vociferus, a Goatsucker common in the eastern parts of the United States. About ten inches long; plumage tawny brown, much mottled and indistinctly marked with small transverse bands, top of the head streaked with black, and a narrow white collar on throat. The popular name of the bird is derived from the cry, which bears some resemblance to these words. Nuttall (Ornithol. United States) says that "in the lower part of the state of Delaware he found these birds troublesomely abundant in the breeding season, so that the reiterated echoes of 'whip-poor-will,' 'whip-peri-will,' issuing from several birds at the same time, occasioned such a confused vociferation as at first to banish sleep." The habits of the bird are like those of the European Goatsucker. [CAPRIMULGUS.]

whip-ray, s. The same as STING-RAY. So called from its long and slender tail.

whip-roll, s.

whip'-pīng, pr. par., a. & s. [WHIP, v.]

A. & B. As pr. par. & particip. adj.: (See the verb.)

C. As subst.: The act of punishing with a whip; the act of flogging; the punishment inflicted.

"Do not flay him who deserves alone

A whipping for the fault that he hath done."

Creech: Horace; Sat., iii. 1.

¶ In mediæval times in England the punishment of whipping was inflicted on persons of low rank convicted of petty larceny and other small offenses. By Act 1 George IV., c. 57, this punishment was abolished in the case of women. By 24 & 25 Vict., c. 96-100, boys below sixteen years old are liable to be whipped; 25 Vict., c. 18, limits the number of strokes to twelve, with a birch-rod, for a boy under twelve years old. The Act 26 & 27 Vict., c. 44, extends whipping to males of any age convicted of robbery with violence, such as garroting. The criminal may be whipped once, twice, or three times. If he be under sixteen, the number of strokes inflicted at each whipping must not exceed twenty-five; if he be above sixteen, they must not exceed fifty. In the United States whipping as a punishment has been everywhere abolished, with the exception of the state of Delaware, where it is still inflicted for wife-beating.

whipping-boy, s. A boy formerly educated with a prince and punished in his stead. (Fuller: Church Hist., ii. 382.)

1. Ord. Lang.: A machine contrived for the purpose of exhibiting the principal effects of centripetal or centrifugal forces when bodies revolve in the circumference of circles or on an axis.

2. Pottery: A throwing-table. [POTTER'S WHEEL.]

whirl'-pool, *whirl-pole, *whirle-poole, s. [Eng. whirl, and pool.]

1. Ord. Lang. & Hydrology: A spot in a river or in the sea in which, through obstructions to flowing water, produced by banks, islands, rocks, or by winds or currents, a rotatory motion is imparted to the moving fluid. Revolutions of such a nature on a minute scale, may be seen on nearly every streamlet; but the term whirlpool is used almost exclusively of the same phenomenon on a large scale. There is a tendency to vortical motion below most waterfalls. The Maelström, which obtained such celebrity, is in large measure mythic. A strong tidal current runs between the islands of Moskøe and Warae, where it exists, at one time from north to south, at another in the reverse direction. When the wind acts obliquely on the tidal current, a certain approach to vortical motion may be discerned, but there is no genuine whirl. It is the same with the classic whirlpool alleged to exist between Scylla and Charybdis. There is a tumult of waters in stormy weather, but nothing more. The whirlpool of Coryvreckan, or Corrievrecken, alluded to by Scott (Lord of the Isles, iv. 11), is situated between the north of Jura and the little island of Scarba in the Hebrides. The strong current which runs through the channel between the two islands encounters a pyramidal rock rising to within fifteen fathoms of the surface, and, becoming deflected from the straight course, takes a circular form.

*2. Zool.: A kind of whale; a whirl-whale.

"The ork, whirlpool, whale, or huffing physeter."

Sylvester: Du Bartas, fifth day, first week.

whirl'-wig, s. [Eng. whirl, and A. S. wiega, a kind of insect, a species of bug or beetle, &c.]

Entom.: Gyrinus natator. [GYRINUS.]

whirl'-wind, *whyrle-wynde, s. [Icel. hvirlvindr; Dan. hvirlvind; Sw. hvirlvind.]

1. Lit. & Meteor.: A violent wind moving spirally, as if revolving round an axis, which has at the same time progressive motion. Whirlwinds are produced by two currents of air proceeding in different directions, and the course of the whirlwind is determined by the stronger of the two currents. Thus, supposing a whirlwind to arise from a north wind blowing somewhat to the west of a south wind, when the outer currents come in contact if the north wind is the stronger, the direction of the whirl would be north, west, south, east; but the whirl-current will move in a contrary direction if the south wind be the stronger. Whirlwinds often originate in the tropics, especially in flat, sandy districts, during the hot season. The ground becoming unequally heated by the sun, gives rise to ascending columns of heated air, which result in whirl-currents drawing up large clouds of dust, and frequently doing great damage to buildings and crops. [SIMOOM, WATERSPOUT.]

"In this dire season, oft the whirlwind's wing Sweeps up the burden of whole wintry plains
At one wide waft."
Thomson: Winter, 269.

2. Fig.: A violent rush.

"The deer was flying through the park, followed by the whirlwind of hounds and hunters."
Macaulay: Hist. Eng., ch. xxi.

- *2. Making secret insinuations of evil; backbiting.
3. Making a soft, low, sibilant sound.

"Soft whispering airs shall lull thee to repose!"

Cowper: Elegy on the Approach of Spring.

C. As subst.: The act of one who whispers; a whisper.

¶ Whispering is speech without any employment of the vocal chords, and is effected chiefly by the lips and tongue. (Foster: Physiol.) whispering-gallery, whispering-dome, subst. A gallery or dome of an elliptical or circular form, in which faint sounds conveyed around the interior wall may be readily heard, while the same are inaudible elsewhere in the interior. Thus in an elliptical chamber if a person standing in one of the foci speak in a whisper, he will be heard distinctly by a person standing in the other focus, although the same sound would not be audible at the same distance under any other circumstances or at any other place in the chamber. There is a Whispering Gallery in the capitol at Washington, one at St. Paul's Cathedral, London, and another at Gloucester Cathedral, England.

"Whispering-galleries are formed of smooth walls having a continuous curved form. The mouth of the speaker is presented at one point, and the ear of the hearer at another and distant point. In this case, the sound is successively reflected from one point to the other until it reaches the ear."—Atkinson: Ganot's Physics, § 234.

whis'-pēr-lŭg-lŷ, adv. [Eng. whispering; -ly.] In a whispering manner; in a whisper or low voice.

"He said to Hopeful, whisperingly, 'There is more hope of a fool than of him.'"—Bunyan: Pilgrim's Progress, pt. i.

whis'-pēr-ōŭs-lŷ, adv. [Eng. whisper; -ous; -ly.] In a whisper; whisperingly.

"The Duchess . . . gabbles on whisperously."—Lytton: What will he do with it? bk. v., ch. viii.

whis'-sle, v. & s. [WHISTLE, v. & s.] whist, interj. a. & s. [A slight sound, expressive of the breathing or whispering of some one approaching; cf. Lat. st!=hist; Ger. st! bst! pst!=hush, hist.]

*A. As interj.: Hush! silence! be still!

"Whist, wanton, still ye."—Lodge: Euphues: Golden Legacie.

*B. As adj.: Not speaking; not making a noise; mute, quiet, still. (Generally used as a predicate.)

"Underneath a hill

Far from the town (where all is whist and still)."

Marlowe: Hero and Leander, sest. i.

C. As subst.: A game at cards, so called from the silence necessary to play it attentively and correctly. It was formerly also called whisk. It is played by four persons, two of whom are partners against the other two. The full pack of fifty-two cards is used, thirteen being dealt out to each player in order, the dealer beginning with himself, and dealing from left to right. The last card dealt is turned face up on the table, and is called the trump card; the suit to which it belongs has for the hand the privilege of taking or being superior to any card of any other suit. The cards rank in value as follows: Ace (the highest), king, queen, knave, ten, nine, eight, and so on. The game is commenced by the player on the left hand of the dealer laying one card face upward on the table, this being called leading off; the player on his left then plays a card of the same suit (if he has one), and is followed similarly by the player on his left. When all have played, the person who has played the highest card takes up the four cards played, these constituting what is termed a trick. If a player has no card of the suit led off, he may play one of any other suit. The winner of the first trick then leads off with any card he pleases for the second trick, the winner of which becomes the leader of the third trick, and so on. The score is taken as follows when the hand is played out: the partners who conjointly have won the majority out of the thirteen tricks, score one point for every trick over six. The ace, king, queen, and knave are called honors, and the partners who hold between them three of these cards score two points, and if they hold all of them they score four points; this is technically known as scoring two (or four) by honors. If each side holds two of these cards, honors are said to be divided or easy. In long whist (now becoming obsolete) ten points make a game; in short whist only five points are required, and in this it is usual to count by tricks alone. A rubber consists of three games, and is won by the partners who score two of them. If one side wins the first two games the third is not played out. There are several modifications of the game, such as solo whist, three-handed whist, &c.

"With rhyme by Hoare, and epic blank by Hoyle:

Not him whose page, if still upheld by whist, Requires no sacred theme to bid us list."

Byron: English Bards and Scotch Reviewers.

whist, v. i. & t. [WHIST, interj.]

A. Intrans.: To be or become silent, mute, or still.

"They whisted all."—Surrey: Virgil's Æneid, ii. 1.

B. Trans.: To make silent, mute, or still; to hush.

whis'-tle (tle as el), v. i. & t. [A. S. hwistlan, hwistlian; cogn. with Dan. hvisle=to whistle, to hiss; Sw. hvisla=to whistle. A word of imitative origin, like whisper, whiz, &c.]

A. Intransitive:

1. To make a musical sound with the lips and breath without using the vocal cords; the hollow of the mouth forming a resonance-box.

"Have, then, thy wish!"—he whistled shrill."

Scott: Lady of the Lake, v. 9.

2. To utter a more or less shrill or piercing sound, or series of sounds, as a bird.

"The blackbird whistles from the thorny brake."

Thomson: Spring, 604.

3. To produce a sound or sounds by means of a particular kind of wind instrument (or whistle) or by means of steam forced through a small orifice.
4. To sound shrill or like a pipe.

"The wild winds whistle, and the billows roar."

Pope: Homer's Odyssey, vii. 357.

5. To cause a sharp, shrill sound.

"A bullet whistled o'er his head."

Byron: The Giaour.

B. Transitive:

1. To form, utter, or modulate by whistling.
2. To call, direct, or signal by a whistle.

"He cast off his friends, as a huntsman his pack,
For he knew, when he pleased, he could whistle them back."

Goldsmith: Retaliation, 107.

¶ (1) To go whistle: To go to the deuce.

"Your fame is secure, let the critics go whistle."

Shenstone: Poet and the Dunc.

(2) To whistle for a wind: A superstitious practice among old sailors of whistling during a calm to obtain a breeze. Such men, on the contrary, will not whistle during a storm.

(3) To whistle off:

Falconry: To send off by a whistle; to send from the fist in search of prey; hence, to dismiss or send away generally; to dismiss. Hawks were always let fly against the wind; if they flew with the wind behind them they seldom returned. If, therefore, a hawk was for any reason to be dismissed or abandoned she was let off down the wind.

"If I could prove her haggard,

Though that her jesses were my dear heartstrings,
I'd whistle her off, and let her down the wind,
To prey at fortune."

Shakesp.: Othello, iii. 3.

fâte, fât, färe, amidst, whât, fâll, father; wê, wêt, hère, camêl, hêr, thêre; pîne, pît, sîre, sîr, marîne; gô, pôt, or, wôre, wôlf, wôrkh, whô, sôn; mûte, cûb, cûre, ûnite, cûr, rûle, fûll; trŷ, Sŷrian. æ, œ = ē; ey = â. qu = kw.

whis'-tle (tle as el), s. [WHISTLE, v.]

1. A more or less piercing sound produced by forcing the breath through a small opening formed by contracting the lips.

2. Any similar sound; as—

(1) The sharp or shrill note of a bird.

(2) A similar sound produced by an instrument; as, the whistle of a locomotive, or fog-signal.

(3) A sound made by the wind, or by a body passing rapidly through the air; as, the whistle of a bullet.

3. An instrument or apparatus for producing such a sound; as—

(1) A small tin or wooden pipe, pierced with holes, and used as a musical toy.

(2) A small instrument used for signaling, &c., by boatswains, policemen, sportsmen, &c.

(3) The instrument sounded by escaping steam, used for signaling on railway engines, steamships, and the like.

4. The mouth or throat; used principally in the slang phrase, To wet one's whistle=to take a draught or draw.

"My whistle once wet,
I'll pipe him such a paven."
Beaum. & Flét.: Mad Lover, ii.

¶ (1) At one's whistle: Ready at one's call.

"Ready at his whistle to array themselves round him in arms against the commander-in-chief."—Macaulay: Hist. Eng., ch. xiii.

(2) To pay for one's whistle, to pay dear for one's whistle: To pay a high price for what one fancies; to pay dearly for indulging one's whim, caprice, fancy or the like. The allusion is to a story told by Dr. Franklin of his nephew, who set his mind on a common whistle, which he bought of a boy for four times its value.

"If a man likes to do it, he must pay for his whistle."—G. Elliot: Daniel Deronda, ch. xxxv.

(3) Worth the whistle: Worth calling, worth inviting; worth notice. The dog is worth the pains of whistling for. Thus Heywood, in one of his dialogues, consisting entirely of proverbs, says, "It is a poor dog that is not worth the whistling." Goneril says to Albany—

"I have been worth the whistle."
Shakesp.: Lear, iv. 2.

whistle-drunk, a. Completely drunk.

"He was indeed, according to the vulgar phrase, whistle-drunk."—Fielding: Tom Jones, bk. xii., ch. ii.

whistle-fish, s.

Ichthy.: Motella tricirrhata, the Three-bearded Rockling. Pennant says the name was applied to the fish because "the Cornish fishermen whistle when desirous of taking this fish, as if by that they facilitated its capture." (See extract.)

"I believe, indeed, that while preserving the sound of the name, the term has been changed, and a very different word substituted, and that for whistle-fish we ought to read weasel-fish. Both the Three and Five-bearded Rocklings were called mustela from the days of Pliny to those of Rondelet, and thence to the present time."—Yarrell: British Fishes, i. 577.

whistle-tankard, s. A tankard fitted with a whistle, so arranged as to sound when the vessel was emptied, thus warning the drawer that more liquor was required.

Zoölogy: Amphisbæna alba, eighteen to twenty inches long, and about as thick as a man's finger. [AMPHISBÆNIDE.]

white-antimony, s. [VALENTINITE.]

white-ants, s. pl.

Entomol.: A popular name for any of the Termitidæ (q. v.). The resemblance to the ants, Formicidæ, &c., is in the general aspect, their life in social communities, the appearance at certain times of many winged individuals, and the nature of the habitations. But they belong to different orders, the venation of the wings being different. A white ant looks not unlike a soft immature earwig, but without the forceps. White ants constitute the most destructive insect pest to be found in the tropics. They do not attack human beings, their ravages being confined to property. They make their way into houses through some minute aperture which they have themselves formed in the floor or in the wall. Up to the moment of emergence they give no indication of their existence, and when they come forth, which they do in thousands, they take every means in their power to shun observation, while busily engaged in destructive work. Nothing external may reveal the fact that the joists or rafters on which they have been operating are weakened and rendered unsafe by being all pierced internally with their galleries. If they can effect an entrance into a library they bring up mud and construct tunnels with it so as to glue one book to another, and eat away the leather or cloth by which the boards were affixed to the book itself, besides rounding off the angles of a number of the volumes. Whatever is in danger of them is placed on a table or frame, the legs of which rest on stone stands, surrounded by water; but sooner or later the native servant forgets to replenish the water, the white ants immediately taking advantage of the neglect, or they attempt to swim. Some perish, while the survivors pass the fosse on the dead bodies of their comrades and are soon at work. Every historical document in India is in danger from these destructive creatures. Professor Drummond suggests that white ants probably render the same service in the tropics which earthworms do in temperate lands.

White Cross, s. An organization similar in many respects to the famous Red Cross, from which it differs chiefly in the fact that it is distinctly American. It was founded in 1898 by Mrs. Jane Creighton, of Portland, Ore., who became its first president. Its emblem is designed to represent the cross bandages of white upon the blood-red field of war, encircled by the blue of the firmament, comprising the triple color of the Union. The motto of the organization is "Truth, Charity and Philanthropy," and its purposes include not only the caring for wounded and sick American soldiers and sailors, but the aiding of the widows and orphans of those who are killed in battle or die of disease or accident. The organization is self-supporting, and all it asks of the national government is recognition and protection.

white-cross knight, s. A Knight Hospitaller. The order wore a white cross to distinguish them from the Knights Templar, who wore a red one.

white-elephant, s.

1. Lit. & Zoöl.: An elephant affected with albinism. Such animals appear to have been known to the ancients (Ælian. iii. 46; Hor. Ep. ii. 1. 195). They are highly esteemed by some eastern potentates, and are considered sacred in Siam. A specimen purchased by Mr. Barnum from King Theebaw of Burmah was brought to America in 1884. It stood seven feet and a half high, and the face, ears, front of trunk, fore feet, and part of breast were of a light ash color.

2. Fig.: A present which does one much more harm than good, or more generally any nominal advantage which has this effect. It is generally reported that when the king of Siam desires to ruin any one, he makes him a present of a white elephant [1.]. The sacred elephant has an enormous appetite, and, being sacred, it is a crime to let it die, so that the gift generally entails ruin on the recipient.

white-ermine, s.

Entom.: Spilosoma menthastris. (Stainton.) Arctia menthastris. (Newman.) One of the Cheloniidae (approximately=Arctiidae, q. v.). Fore wings, yellowish white, with four curved, transverse rows of Bot.: Pyrus aria. (Evelyn.) Named from the silvery under-surface of the leaves.

white-league, s. The name given a semi-military organization, gathered to repress the negroes of the State of Louisiana, who, it was asserted, were meditating insurrection. The organization had its inception in the City of New Orleans, in 1874, and upon the refusal of the city authorities to allow the landing of a cargo of fire-arms, which the league had imported from New York, a riot ensued which resulted in more than one hundred deaths. The league afterward became a powerful factor in Louisiana politics, and, more than any other agency, helped the Democrats to a control of the state government, although the colored voting population, which was almost a unit of Republican politics, largely out-numbered the white Democrats. The existence of this organization was an occasion of much rancorous argument, their opponents charging them with fraud and intimidation in the matter of elections, while their friends on the other hand, and perhaps justifiably, claimed that such an organization was necessary to hold in check a lawless and irresponsible element with which the municipal and state governments had shown themselves utterly unable to cope. In late years the organization has been in a state of quiescence, for although on more than one occasion mob violence has temporarily been exerted in the state, the acts done could not be traced to the agency of the league.

white-leather, s. [WHITLEATHER, 1.]

white-leg, s.

Pathol.: Phlegmasia dolens (q. v.).

white-legged, a. Having white legs.

white-leprosy, s.

"Sir George has told me a lie—a white-lie he says, but I hate a white-lie."—Mad. D'Arblay: Diary, iv. 287.

white-light, s.

Optics: The apparently simple sensation which is nevertheless really produced on the retina by a certain mixture of colors. Ordinarily white light is composed of the whole of the visible colors of the spectrum, as in sunlight; and the fact of white resulting from this mixture can be demonstrated in many ways, as by re-uniting the spectral colors themselves, or by revolving rapidly a disc [NEWTON'S DISC] painted with the colors in separate sectors. A similar mixture of pigments fails, partly because the pigments themselves are never pure colors, and partly and chiefly because pigments act rather as absorbents of the light reflected from the paper or other colors underneath than as additional illuminating colors. White light can, however, be also compounded of three, or of only two colors, which are then called complementary colors. Such white is quite undistinguishable by the eye from white compounded of all the colors; and hence it follows that the eye is not an ultimate appeal in such matters, but is easily deceived by apparently similar total results really compounded of quite different materials. The same applies to colors, which can also be imitated so far as the eye can judge, but analysis by the prism reveals the different composition of the light instantly.

white-lily, s.

Bot.: Lilium candidum. [LILIUM, ¶.]

white-lime, s. A solution or preparation of lime used for whitewashing; a variety of whitewash.

whīz'-zīng-lŷ, adv. [Eng. whizzing; -ly.] With a whizzing sound.

whô (w silent) (poss. whose, accus. whom), pron. [A. S. hwā=who (interrogative), masc. & fem.; whæt, neut.; gen. hwæs, for all genders, dat. hwām, hwēm, accus., masc. & fem. hwone, neut. hwæt, instrumental hwi, hwī (Eng. why); cogn. with Dut. wie=who; wat=what; wiens=whose; wien=whom (dat. & accus.); Icel. hverr, hver=who; hvat=what; hvers=whose; hverjum=whom (masc.), pl. hverir; Dan. hvo=who; hvad=what; hvis=whose; hvem=whom (dat. & accus.); Sw. hvem=who, whom; hvad=what; hvems, hvars=whose; Ger. wer=who; was=what; wessen, wess=whose; wem=to whom; wem=whom (accus.); Goth. nom. hwās, hwo, hwa (or hwata), genitive hwis, hwizos, hwis, dat. hwamma, hwizai, hwamma, accusative hwana, hwo, hwa (or hwatu), instrumental hwe, pl. hwai, &c.; Ir. & Gael. co; Wel. pwyl; Lat. quis, quæ, quid; Russ. kto, čto=who, what; Lith. kas=who; Sansc. kas=who; kim=what; kam=whom. "Formerly who, what, which were not relative but interrogative pronouns: which, whose, whom occur as relatives as early as the end of the twelfth century, but who not until the fourteenth century, and was not in common use fāte, fāt, fāre, amidst, whāt, fāll, father; wē, wēt, hēre, camel, hēr, thēre; pīne, pīt, sīre, sīr, marine; gō, pōt, or, wōre, wōlf, wōrk, whō, sōn; mūte, cūb, cūre, unite, cūr, rāle, fūll; trŷ, Sŷrian. æ, œ = ē; ey = ā. qu = kw.

before the sixteenth century." (Morris: Hist. Outlines of Eng. Accidence, § 188.) In genuine idiomatic Scotch who, or wha (including also the possessive and objective), is still only an interrogative, that, or 'at, being the relative. A relative and interrogative pronoun, always used substantively (that is, not joined to a noun), and referring to one or more persons. It is uninflected for number, but has whose for its possessive, and whom for the objective.

1. As an interrogative pronoun=what person or persons?

"Who hath woe? who hath sorrow? who hath contentions?"—Proverbs xxiii. 29.

2. As a relative pronoun=that.

"Happy the man, and happy he alone,
He who can call to-day his own."
Dryden: Imit. Horace, bk. iii., ode. 29.

3. Used elliptically=he (or they) who.

"Who steals my purse steals trash."
Shakesp.: Othello, iii. 3.

4. Whoever.

"Let it be who it is."
Shakesp.: Julius Caesar, i. 3.

¶ Who is used as a relative referring to persons, which to things, and that to either indifferently. Who and which are used in two ways: (1) To connect two coordinate sentences; as, I met a man who told me; I read the book which pleased me. Each of these sentences could be turned into two propositions; as, I met a man and he told me; I read the book and it pleased me. (2) To introduce subordinate or adjectival clauses; as, The book which you are reading; the man who told me. In these cases who and which cannot be turned into and he or and it.

¶ As who should say: As if one should say; as one who said.

"Hope throws a generous contempt upon ill usage, and looks like a handsome defiance of a misfortune; as who should say, you are somewhat troublesome now, but I shall conquer you."—Collier: Against Despair.

whōa, exclam. [From the sound uttered.] Stop! stand still!

whode, s. [HOOD.] A hood.

"A foxes taylor for a scepture, and a whode with two eares."—Bale: English Votaries, p. 104.

whō-ēv'-ēr (w silent), pron. [Eng. who, and ever.] Anyone without exception who; no matter who; any person whatever.

"Whoever doth to temperance apply
His steadfast life." Spenser: F. Q., II. v. 1.

whōle (w silent), hol, hole, wholl, wholle, a. & s. [Properly spelled hole, the original sense being hale or sound. The spelling hole continued in use to the beginning of the sixteenth century. For the prefixed w cf. whot=hot (Spenser: F. Q., II. i. 58); whore=hore; whode=hood, &c. A. S. hāl=whole; cogn. with Dut. heel; Icel. heill; Dan. heel; Sw. hel; Ger. heil; Goth. hails; Gr. kalos=excellent, good, hale; Sansc. kalza=healthy, hale. Whole and hale are doublets, the latter being from the Icel. heill.]

A. As adjective:

1. Hale and sound; in a healthy state; restored to a sound state; healed.

"They that be whole need not a physician."—Matt. ix. 12.

Will have the whole, and not a part."
Longfellow: Golden Legend, iv.

2. A complete system; a complete and regular combination of parts.

"All are but parts of one stupendous whole, Whose Body Nature is, and God the soul."
Pope: Essay on Man, i. 267.

¶ Whole excludes subtraction; entire excludes division; complete excludes deficiency. A whole orange has nothing taken from it; an entire orange is not yet cut; and a complete orange is grown to its full size; it is possible, therefore, for a thing to be whole and not entire; and to be both, and yet not complete: An orange cut into parts is whole while all the parts remain together, but it is not entire: Hence we speak of a whole house, an entire set, and a complete book. The wholeness or integrity of a thing is destroyed at one's pleasure; the completeness depends upon circumstances. (Crabb.)

*¶ (1) By whole sale; By the whole: Wholesale.

"If the currier bought not leather by the whole,"
Greene: Quip for an Upstart Courtier.

(2) Upon the whole: All things considered; taking all things into account; upon a review of the whole matter; altogether.

(3) Of the whole cloth: Unmitigated; unrelieved by any extenuating circumstance; as, a lie out of the whole cloth; i. e., a lie pure and simple.

Beaum. & Flet.: Monsieur Thomas, iv. 2.

whoōp, whoope, s. [WHOOP, v.]

1. A cry of excitement, encouragement, enthusiasm, vengeance, terror, or the like; as, the whoop of a savage.

"Let them breathe a while, and then,
Cry whoop, and set them on again."
Butler: Hudibras, I. ii.

2. A hooping or hooting cry or noise.

*3. A popular name for the hoopoe (q. v.), from its cry [UPUPA], whence Browne (Birds of Norfolk) calls it the Hoope-bird. Cotgrave calls it "a sort of dunghill cock, that loves to nestle in a man's ordure," a fable borrowed from classic natural history. The habits of the bird during incubation, in leaving its nest in a filthy condition, have contributed to give currency to the story, and for this reason it is sometimes called the Dung-bird.

"As copped and high-crested as marish whoops,"—Urquhart: Rabelais, bk. ii., ch. xii.

whoōp, houp-en, v. i. & t. [Properly hoop, the w being excrement, as in whole (q. v.); Fr. houper=to call, shout; cf. Goth. hwopjan=to boast.]

¶ (1) The Wicked:

Script.: One of the two great classes into which, on moral and scriptural considerations, the Bible divides all mankind, or at least all who have had opportunities of becoming acquainted with revelation. No third or intermediate class is recognized; nor do the two great classes in any way shade into each other. The primary error of the wicked is that they condemn God (Psalm x. 13) and will not seek him. They plot and carry out evil projects (Psalm ix. 16, xi. 2), and hence the Lord is far from them (Prov. xv. 29), and is angry with them every day (Psalm vii. 11). At last the wicked shall be severed from the just and cast into "a furnace of fire," in other words the place of woe (Matt. xiii. 49, 50).

(2) The Wicked Bible: An edition published A. D. 1632, by Barber and Lucas, in which the word not is omitted from the seventh Commandment.

To be a widow-maker."

Shakesp.: King John, v. 2.

widow-monkey, s.

Zoöl.: Callithrix lugens, from South America. It has been compared to a diminutive black dog with a white face; the neck and fore limbs are also white, and this disposition of color has given rise to the popular name bestowed on the animal by the Creoles, who see in the whiteness of the face, neck, and arms some resemblance to the veil, handkerchief, and gloves worn by widows of their own race.

Widow-monkey.

widow-sacrifice, s.

Anthrop.: A form of funeral-sacrifice in which the widow was slain or induced to commit suicide so that she might be buried with her husband and accompany him to the world of spirits. This practice is mentioned as existing among the Greeks by Euripides (Suppl., 983) and Pausanias (iv. 2), and from Caesar (de Bello Gall., vi. 19) it may be inferred that it existed also in Gaul. Widow-sacrifice is still the custom in many African tribes; traces of it may be found in China; it lingered till late in the first half of the nineteenth century in Fiji, and though abolished by law in British India in 1829, is not yet abandoned. [SUTTEE, 1.]

"Widow-sacrifice is found in various regions of the world under a low state of civilization, and this fits with the hypothesis of its having belonged to the Aryan race while yet in an early and barbarous condition."—Tylor: Prim. Cult. (ed. 1873), i. 467.

widow's terce, s. [TERCE, 4.]

wid-ōw (2), s. [See compound.]

widow-bird, s.

Ornith.: The Whidah-bird (q. v.).

"The name Widow-bird is altogether an erroneous title, although it is supposed by many persons to have been given to the bird on account of its dark color and long train, as well as in consequence of its evidently disconsolate state when the beautiful tail-feathers have fallen off after the breeding season . . . In point of fact, however, the proper name is Whidah-bird, a title that was originally given to it by the Portuguese, because the first specimens that were brought to Europe came from the kingdom of Whidah, on the eastern coast of Africa."—Wood: Illus. Nat. Hist., ii. 457.

wid-ōw, v. t. [WIDOW (1), s.]

*wild-brain, s. A harebrain or scatterbrain.

"I must . . . turn wild-brain."—Middleton: A Mad World, i. 1.

wild-bugloss, s.

Bot.: The genus or sub-genus Lycopsis (q. v.), spec. L. arvensis. [BUGLOSS.]

wild-cat, s.

1. Zool.: Felis catus, common in America, Europe, the north of Asia, and Nepal. It is much larger and more stoutly built than the domestic species;

fur gray, inclining to yellow on the face, and nearly white on the belly; black band on back from which transverse dark gray bands proceed, fading as they reach the under surface; tail thick, ringed with gray and black. Wild cats are exceedingly savage, and if wounded will attack man. They breed freely with the domestic species.

2. Fig.: Any business enterprise of an uncertain or unreliable nature. Specif. a swindling or untrustworthy insurance or banking company. The name was applied in the days when there was no national banking system in this country, and when credit was a franchise, and almost every man could put upon the market his individual promise to pay and have it received as currency. "Banks" sprang up like mushrooms, and in many instances the alleged locality of the bank as it appeared on some of these notes was mythical. The name "wild-cat" was first applied to the notes of the state banks of Michigan, afterward notoriously unsound, for the reason that upon the face of these notes was printed a panther. When these notes were found worthless they became the type of a worthless currency, and all money and banks of that quality were consequently called wild-cat. From banks the term has extended to other lines of business, particularly to the insurance business.

"The amount of insurance carried was $7,000, and the names of the companies caused considerable amusement on La Salle street, for, with the exception of one or two well-known wild-cats, the list was not recognized by men who have been in the insurance business a quarter of a century."—Chicago Tribune, Sept. 5, 1894.

wild-celery, s. [APIUM.]

wild-chamomile, s.

Bot.: Matricaria chamomilla. [MATRICARIA.]

Bot.: The squirting cucumber (q. v.).

wild-cumin, s.

Bot.: Lagœcia cuminoides, a small annual umbellifer from Southern and Eastern Europe.

wild-dog, s.

1. Zool.: A feral dog, such as Canis dingo, the Australian, or C. primævus, the Indian wild-dog. [DINGO.]

2. A pariah-dog (q. v.).

"The wild-dog howls o'er the fountain's brim,

With baffled thirst, and famine grim."

Byron: The Giaour.

wild-duck, s.

Ornith.: Anas boschas (†boschas), widely distributed in temperate and arctic regions, known as a bird of passage. Length of male about twenty-four inches; head and neck rich shining green, collar pure white; back chestnut-brown, deepening into black on upper tailcoverts; four central tail-feathers velvety-black and curled, the rest ashen gray, edged with white; greater wing coverts with bold white bar, and tipped with velvet-black; wings purple, white, and velvet-black; upper part of breast dark chestnut, rest of undersurface grayish-white, penciled under wings with dark gray lines. Female somewhat smaller; plumage various shades of brown. The wild duck is the stock whence all the breeds of the domesticated duck have sprung. It pairs when free, but becomes polygamous on domestication.

wild-fire, *wilde-fyre, *wylde-fur, s.

1. A composition of inflammable materials, readily catching fire and hard to be extinguished; Greek fire.

2. A kind of lightning unaccompanied by thunder.

3. A name for erysipelas; also, a name for Lichen circumscriptus, an eruptive disease, consisting of clusters or patches of papule.

4. A name given to a disease of sheep, attended with inflammation of the skin.

Wild-fire rash:

Pathol.: A popular name for a variety of strophulus (q. v.), S. volaticus, in which the papule form circular patches, coming out successively in different parts of the body.

wild-fowl, s. A general name for birds of various species which are pursued as game, but more particularly applied to birds of the order Grallatores and Natatores; water-fowl.

wild-fringed, a. Irregularly bordered.

wild-ginger, s.

Bot.: Asarum canadense. It has broadly reniform leaves in twos, and a woolly, deeply tripartite calyx.

wild-goat, s.

Zool.: A popular name for any undomesticated species of the genus Capra, many of which have been erected into separate genera by some authorities. They are: Capra pyrenaica (Spanish Ibex), C. ibex (the Ibex, q. v.), C. ægagrus, C. caucasica, C. sinaitica (the Sinaitic Ibex), C. waltie, C. sibirica, C. falconeri († megaceros, the Markhoor q. v.), C. jemlanica, (the 1ahr, q. v.), and C. hylœcrius (the Neilgherry Ibex).

wild-goose, s.

1. Lit. & Ornith.: Any species of undomesticated goose—especially the Canadian goose, Branta canadensis; the European bean goose and the graylag.

†2. Fig. (pl.): A term applied to the recruits for the Irish Brigade in the service of France in the seventeenth and eighteenth centuries.

"The wild-geese are coming at length o'er the sea

And Eirinn, green Eirinn once more shall be free."

M. J. Barry: The Wildgeese (Spirit of the Nation).

Wild-goose chase: The pursuit of anything in ignorance of the course it will take; hence, a foolish pursuit or enterprise. According to Dyce, a wild-goose chase was a kind of horse-race, in which two horses were started together, and whichever rider could get the lead, the other was obliged to follow him over whatever ground he chose to go.

"If our wits run the wild-goose chase, I have done; for thou hast more of the wild-goose in one of thy wits, than I have in my whole five."—Shakesp.: Romeo and Juliet, ii. 4.

wild-honey, s. Honey made by wild bees, that is by bees not kept by man.

wild-horse, s.

Zoölogy: Any undomesticated individual of the species Equus caballus. According to Darwin, no aboriginal or truly wild horse is known, and the herds of so-called wild horses in Asia are probably, as those in America and Australia are certainly, descended from ancestors which escaped from the control of man.

wild-hunt, s. [WILD-HUNTSMAN.]

wild-huntsman, s.

Anthrop.: The principal figure in an Aryan storm-myth, in which the phenomena of a tempest are represented as incidents in a hunt or chase. (The legend was popularized by Scott in his Wild Huntsman, an imitation of Bürger's Wilde Jäger.)

"The peasant who keeps up in fireside talk the memory of the Wild Huntsman, Wodejäger, the Grand Veneur of Fontainebleau, Herne the hunter of Windsor Forest, has almost lost the significance of this grand old storm-myth. By mere force of tradition, the name of the 'Wish' or 'Wush' hounds of the Wild Huntsman has been preserved through the west of England; the words must for ages past have lost their meaning among the country-folk, though we may plainly recognize in them Woden's ancient well-known name, old German 'Wunsch.' As of old, the Heaven-god drives the clouds before him in raging tempest across the sky, while, safe within the cottage walls the tale-teller unwittingly describes, in personal legendary shape, this same Wild Hunt of the Storm."—Tylor: Prim. Cult. (ed. 1873), ii. 362.

wild-hyacinth, s.

5. Strong wish or inclination; desire, intention, disposition, pleasure.

"My will is something sorted with his wish."

Shakesp.: Two Gentlemen, i. 3.

6. That which is strongly desired or wished for; as, He had his will.

II. Technically:

1. Law: The legal declaration of a man's intentions as to the disposal of his property after his death; a testament. In England, from the laws of which that of the United States is taken, no will is valid unless it be in writing and signed at the foot or end by the testator, or by some person in his presence and by his direction. Such signature must further be made or acknowledged by the testator in the presence of two or more persons who in his presence, and in the presence of each other, must sign their names as witnesses. An exception is made in the case of soldiers on active service and mariners, who have power to make noncupative wills. [NONCUPATIVE.] In Scotland, formerly only personal property could be disposed of by will, real property being conveyed by a disposition or deed in which the testator's life-rent in the subject was reserved; but heritable property can now be so disposed of.

"The statute 1 Vict., c. 36, having repealed the act of Geo. II., re-enacts and extends some of its provisions. It avoids bequests, not only to an attesting witness, but to the husband or wife of such witness; and expressly provides that the incompetency of a witness to prove the execution of a will, shall not render it invalid. It further enacts that any creditor, or the wife or husband of any creditor, whose debt is charged upon the property devised or bequeathed by the will, may be admitted to prove the execution thereof as an attesting witness; and that an executor of a will may be admitted to prove its execution, a point on which some doubts had previously existed."—Blackstone: Comment., bk. ii., ch. 20.

2. Philosophy:

(1) Though the word will has often been used, as it popularly is, in two senses—the power of the mind which enables a person to choose between two courses of action, and the actual exercise of that power—strict reasoners separate these meanings, calling the former will and the latter volition. Will in this limited sense is that mental power or faculty by which, of two or more objects of desire or courses of action presented to it, it chooses one, rejecting the other or others. To what extent this power of selection is arbitrary, or is the result of necessity, has been for ages a subject of controversy. [FREE-WILL.] The division of the mental powers which came down from antiquity, and was most generally adopted by philosophers, was into the powers belonging to the understanding, and those belonging to the will. Reid adopted it, though considering it not quite logical. "Under the will," he says, "we comprehend our active powers, and all that lead to action or influence the mind to act, such as appetite, passions, affections." (Essays on the Intellectual Powers of Man, essay 1, ch. ii., § 1, 2.) Brown denounced this classification as very illogical, considering that the will was not in any way opposed to the intellect, but exercised in the intellectual department an empire almost as wide as in that which was allotted to itself. "We reason," he says, "and plan and invent, at least as voluntarily as we esteem or hate, or hope or fear" (Philosophy of the Human Mind, sect. xvi.). The term Active Powers used by Reid is a synonym for the will.

(2) The conception of will is taken by Schopenhauer (1788-1860) in a far broader sense than that given to it by common usage. He includes in it not only conscious desire, but also unconscious instinct, and the forces which manifest themselves in inorganic nature. As intermediate between the one universal Will and the individuals in which it appears, he posits, following the example of Plato, various ideas, which are the stages of the objectification of will. His ethical requirements are sympathy with the suffering which is connected with all objectifications of the will to live, and the mortification, not of life, but rather of the will to live, through asceticism. The world, in his system, is the worst of all possible worlds; sympathy alleviates suffering, while asceticism destroys it by destroying the will to live, in the midst of life. In its negation of the sensuous nature in man, without positive determination of the true end of spiritual life, Schopenhauer's teaching resembles the Buddhist doctrine of Nirvana. (Ueberweg.)

¶ (1) At will: At pleasure; as, to hold an estate or office at will, i. e., to enjoy the possession during the pleasure of another, and to be liable to be ousted at any time by him.

(2) Good-will: [GOODWILL.]

(3) To have one's will: To obtain what one desires; to be able to act as one wishes.

(4) To work one's will: To act absolutely according to one's will, wish, pleasure, or discretion; to do or be able to do exactly as one fancies.

(5) With a will: With willingness, pleasure, and zeal; with all one's heart; heartily.

will-less, a. Involuntary.

"Join blind duty and will-less resignation."—Richardson: Clarissa, i. 99.

will-worship, s. Worship according to one's own fancy; worship imposed merely by human will, not on divine authority; supererogatory worship.

"Which things have indeed a show of wisdom in will-worship."—Col. ii. 23.

will-worshipper, s. One who practices will-worship.

"He that says, God is rightly worshipped by an act or ceremony concerning which himself hath no way express'd his pleasure, is superstitious or a will-worshipper."—Bp. Taylor: Rule of Conscience, bk. ii., ch. iii.

will (2), subst. [See def.] An abbreviation of William.

will-o'-the-wisp, will-with-a-wisp, s.

1. Ord. Lang.: An Ignis fatuus (q. v.).

2. Bot.: Tremella nostoc.

will (pres. I will, *I wol, thou willest, thou wilt (as v. i. & aux.), he wills, he (you, we, they) will; pa. t. would, wolde*, v. i. t. & aux. [A. S. willan, wyllan (pa. t. wolde, pl. woldan, woldon, woldun); cogn. with Dut. willen; Icel. vilja (pa. t. vilda); Dan. vill; Sw. vilja; Ger. wollen (pr. t. will, pa. t. wollte); Goth. wiljan (pa. t. wilda); Lat. volō (infin. velle, pa. t. volui); Gr. boulomai=to wish, to desire; Sansc. vri=to choose, to select, to prefer. From the same root come well, adv., weal, willful, wild, voluntary, &c.]

A. Intransitive:

1. To determine by an act of choice; to form a wish or volition; to exercise an act of the will; to decide.

"Not so the king of men: he will'd to stay."

Pope: Homer's Odyssey, iii. 175.

2. To desire, to wish.

"Nevertheless, not as I will, but as thou wilt."—Matthew xxvi. 39.

3. To be willing; to consent.

"Lord, if thou wilt, thou canst make me clean."—Matthew viii. 2.

*4. To dispose of one's effects by will or testament; to make one's will.

B. Transitive:

1. To determine by an act of choice; to decide; to ordain; to form a volition of.

"A man that sits still is said to be at liberty, because he can walk if he wills it."—Locke.

2. To have an intention, purpose, or desire of; to desire, to wish, to intend.

"Not willing any further conference."

Shakesp.: Henry VI., Pt. III., ii. 2.

*3. To be inclined, resolved, or anxious to have; to desire.

"There, there, Hortensio, Will you any wife?"

Shakesp.: Taming of the Shrew, i. 1.

*4. To convey or express a command or authoritative instructions to; to direct, to order.

"They willed me say so."

Shakesp.: Henry VIII., iii. 1.

*5. To desire or wish to produce or cause; to be anxious for.

6. To dispose of by testament; to give as a legacy; to bequeath.

¶ In the two following uses directly from the noun. [WILL, 2.]

C. As an auxiliary verb:

1. A word denoting either simple futurity or futurity combined with volition, according to the subject of the verb.

"I am your wife, if you will marry me."

Shakesp.: Tempest, iii. 1.

(1) In the first person singular and plural, I (we) will, the verb denotes willingness, consent, intention, determination, or fixed purpose, thus differing from shall, which in the first person denotes simple futurity; as, I will go if you wish it, I will speak if I please. (2) In the second and third persons, will denotes simple futurity or certainty, the idea of volition, purpose, or wish being lost; as, He will certainly come.

2. Would stands in the same relation to will as should to shall, and is mainly employed in subjunctive, conditional, or optative senses, in the last case having often the functions and force of an independent verb; as—

(1) Subjunctive or conditional:

"Backward she thrust him as she would be thrust."

Shakesp.: Venus and Adonis, 41.

(2) Optative:

"I would my valiant master would destroy thee."—Shakesp.: Tempest, iii. 2.

(3) Also used, by omission of the pronoun, as an exclamation of wish, prayer, or desire.

"Would to God we had died in Egypt."—Exodus xvi. 3.

¶ In such sentences as, It would seem, It would appear, &c., would retains almost nothing of conditionality, having merely the effect of softening a direct statement. Would sometimes is used to express a habit or custom; as, He would read all day. In such sentences as, He would go and you see the result, would has nearly the force of a simple past indicative, but is more emphatic. Will and would were formerly used elliptically with adverbs and prepositional phrases to express motion or change of place, where we should now say will go, would go, or the like.

"I'll never to sea again."

Shakesp.: Merry Wives, ii. 1.

A similar elliptical use occurs in such phrases as; What would you?—What would you have, do, or wish?

wil'-lîng-ness, s. [Eng. willing; ness.] The quality or state of being willing; freedom from reluctance; readiness; free choice or consent of the will.

wil'-lôck, s. [See extract.]

Ornith.: The young of Uria troile, the Common Guillemot.

"The cry of the young Guillemot is willock, willock, whence its local name, and the same is probably the origin of the French derived Guillemot for the adult; a term seldom employed by the fishermen and cliffmen, excepting when speaking to strangers."—Yarrell: Brit. Birds (ed. 4th), iv. 72.

wil'-lough-bê'-a (gh silent), subst. [WILLOUGH-BEIA.]

wil'-lôw, wil'-ow, wilwe, subst. [A. S. welig; cogn. with O. Dut. wilge; Dut. wilg; Low Ger. wilge. From the same root as walk, welkin, and withy.]

I. Ordinary Language:

1. Lit. & Bot.: Any species of the genus Salix (q. v.). Used also in a more limited sense for any Salix which is not known as an osier or a willow. [OSIER, SALLOW.] Some of the willows in the limited sense furnish good timber. The Bedford willow, Salix russelliana, a variety of S. fragilis, the Crack Willow or Withy, is a tree sometimes attaining fifty feet in height and twelve in girth. It was first brought into notice by the Duke of Bedford, whence its name, and is very valuable for its timber, the bark containing much tannin, and a larger amount of salicine (q. v.) than any other of the genus. Another valuable timber tree is S. alba, the Huntingdon or White Willow. It is eighty feet high, with a girth of twenty feet. The timber is used for carpentry and for fuel, and the bark for tanning. It is common in America. [SALIX.]

2. Figuratively:

(1) Mourning.

"We see your willow and are sorry for 't,
And though it be a wedding we are half mourners."

Beaum. & Flet.: Night Walker, i.

(2) In cricketing slang, the bat, so called from the material of which it is made.

II. Technically:

1. Weaving: A machine for cleaning cotton, wool, or hemp; a devil. [DEVIL. s., II. 3 (1).]

"The term willow is said to have been derived from the fact that in the early forms of the machine a cylindrical willow cage was used. It is more than probable that the term is derived from the willow-wands wherewith the cotton was beaten, to loosen it and eject the impurities, before the invention of machinery for the purpose."—Knight: Dict. Mechanics.

2. Script.: Probably the Oleander (q. v.).

*¶ To wear the willow: To assume mourning or grieve for a lost lover.

willow-beauty, s.

Entomology: A European Geometer-moth, Boarmia rhomboidaria. Wings grayish-brown, with a darker spot and lines. The caterpillar is very common in September on roses, plums, &c.

willow-fly, s.

Entom.: (1) Chloroperla viridis; (2) Nemura variegata. [PERLIDÆ.]

willow-gall, s.

Veg. Pathol.: A gall produced on willows by the puncture of a dipterous insect, Cecidomyia strobilina, in the leaf buds, which causes arrest of growth so that the stem scarcely develops, and the leaves are crowded together into a close rosette. (Thomé.)

willow-ground, s. A piece of marshy ground in which osiers are cultivated; an osier bed.

Entom.: Lagopus albus, from the northern portions of both hemispheres. It resembles the Ptarmigan in plumage, and, like that species, becomes white in winter. Called also White Grouse and White Ptarmigan.

"With us there is no reason why it should assume the white winter plumage like its congeners; and yet there can be no question that our bird is the local representative of the white willow-grouse which ranges over the whole of Northern Europe."—St. James's Gazette, Jan. 6, 1887.

willow-herb, s.

Botany:

1. The genus Epilobium and specially E. angustifolium; called more fully the Rosebay willow herb, or simply the Rose-bay. It is a tall undershrub, four to six feet high, with scattered lanceolate, or linear lanceolate, veined, glabrous, willow-like leaves, three to six inches long (whence its name), irregular, rose-purple flowers an inch in diameter. It is found by moist river-sides and copses, chiefly in Scotland, also on the continent of Europe, in temperate Asia, and North America. Ale and vinegar are made in Kamtchatka from the fermentation of the pith dried and boiled; the young leaves are sometimes eaten, the mature ones are narcotic. From the scent of its flowers the plant is sometimes called Apple Pie.

2. Lysimachia vulgaris.

Ornith.: The Sedge-warbler. (Pennant: British Zool., ed. 1768, ii. 241.)

willow-leaves, s. pl.

Astron.: Another name for Rice-grains (q. v.). [SUN.]

willow-moth, s.

Entom.: Caradrina cubicularis, a common European Night-moth, called by Newman the Pale Mottled Willow Moth. Fore wings ochery gray, with two dark spots on the costa; hind wings white, with a dark brown line on the posterior margin. The caterpillar, which is small at harvest time, becomes housed with the grain, the peas, &c., and doing immense damage. It changes to a chrysalis in May.

willow-oak, s.

Bot.: Quercus phellos. Leaves smooth, membranous, linear, lanceolate, pointed, entire; acorn roundish. A large tree with strong coarse timber, growing in swampy forests near the southern shores of the United States.

willow-pattern, s. A well-known pattern for stone and porcelain ware, generally executed in dark blue, in imitation of a Chinese design. The name is taken from a willow-tree, which is a prominent object in the design.

willow-thorn, s.

Bot.: Hippophaë rhamnoides. So named because it is a thorny shrub with the habit of a willow.

willow-warbler, s. [WILLOW-WREN.]

willow-weed, s.

Bot.: (1) Lythrum salicaria; (2) various species of Polygonum, specially P. lapathifolium.

willow-wren, willow-warbler, s.

Ornith.: Phylloscopus (†Sylvia) trochilus; called also the Willow-warbler, and Yellow-wren, from the localities it frequents and the general color of its plumage. Length about five inches; dull olive-green on the upper part of the body; chin, throat, and breast yellowish-white; abdomen nearly pure white. In temperate climates the Willow-wren begins to couple about the end of April. The nest is placed on the ground, most commonly against a bank among long grass or weeds, but often at the foot of a bush, and, like that of the Wood-wren, is covered with a dome having a rather wide hole in the side, whence this species and its congeners are called "Oven-birds." The Willow-wren is a graceful, active bird, flitting restlessly from twig to twig, and the song is loud and sweet.

wil'-lôw, wil'-ly, v. t. [WILLOW, s.] To open and cleanse, as cotton, by means of a willow.

"When the cotton has been willowed."—London Morning Chronicle.

†wil'-lôwed, a. [Eng. willow; -ed.] Abounding or planted with willows.

10. That part of the body in the neighborhood of the stomach, a blow on which causes temporary inability to breathe. (Slang.)

11. Anything light or insignificant as wind, such as empty or idle words, idle threats, unmeaning talk, or the like.

"Stop in your wind."
Shakesp.: Comedy of Errors, i. 2.

*12. A sigh.

"Storming her world with sorrow's wind and rain."
Shakesp.: Complaint of a Lover, 7.

II. Meteor.: A current of air moving in the atmosphere in any direction or with any velocity. Winds are produced by variations of temperature in different latitudes, or at different portions of the same latitude. Heated air tends to ascend, and, to prevent a void from arising in the lower portion of the atmosphere from which it has ascended, a current of air, colder, and therefore denser, takes its place. This phenomenon is most obvious in the tropics, from which hot rarefied air is ever ascending, one part toward the Northern, and the other toward the Southern Pole. From these two regions, cold currents of air proceed near the surface of the ground or the ocean to supply the threatened void. Were the earth at rest, the hot currents would depart from, and the cold currents strike the equator at right angles, but owing to the rotation of the earth from west to east, more quickly than its friction can carry the atmosphere with it, the latter is somewhat deflected to the westward, the hot current leaving and the cold one striking the equatorial line at an oblique instead of a right angle. As the circles to be traversed by the rotating sphere or spheroid vary in magnitude in every latitude, cyclones tend to be generated which rotate in one direction, when they arise to the north, and in another when they are generated south of the equator. [CYCLONE.] The heat of the vertical or nearly vertical sun rarefies the atmosphere in the tropics over both land and water, not, however, to the same extent. Land is easily heated during the day and cooled during the night. Water is less easily changed in temperature, hence every tropical island is like a separate furnace, at work during the day rarefying the air and sending it upward, while, falling below the temperature of the ocean during the night, it modifies, suspends, or reverses the process, especially if the absence of clouds make radiation great. Hence, land and sea breezes arise; the former blowing during the day from the sea to the land, the latter during the night in a contrary direction. Next, every high mountain is a refrigerating apparatus, capable of sending down its slope cooled air on all its sides, and consequently from every point of the compass. Even apart from these local complications, the higher the heated air which ascends from the tropics rises, the colder the atmospheric region into which it enters; it therefore ultimately parts with the caloric which enabled it to ascend, and begins to fall, while the cold polar currents blowing toward the equator become heated, especially where their course is over the land, and ascend. Observation shows that in consequence of these causes, there are eight principal directions in which winds blow: From the north, the northeast, the east, the southeast, the south, the southwest, the west, and the northwest. A north wind is one which blows from the north, not one blowing to that region, and so with the others. Classified according to the direction in which they blow, winds are divided into Regular, Periodical, and Variable Winds. The first are winds which blow all the year round in the same direction, as the Trade winds; the second those which blow regularly at the same seasons and the same hours of the day, as the monsoons, the land and sea breezes, and the simoon; the third, which blow sometimes in one direction and sometimes in another, as the prevalent winds of the temperate and arctic zones. The direction of the wind is easily ascertained by a vane. [ANEMOMETER.]

¶ Characteristics of wind: At 5 miles per hour a wind is called a gentle breeze; at 10, a brisk wind; at from 20 to 25, a very brisk wind; at 35, a high wind; at 45, a very high wind; at 50, a storm; at 60, a great storm; at 80, a hurricane; at 100, a great hurricane, carrying trees before it. The pressure per square foot increases from nearly 2 pounds when the wind is 20 miles per hour to nearly 50 pounds when it is 100 miles per hour.

¶ 1. Between wind and water:

(1) Lit.: That part of a ship's side or bottom which frequently rises above the surface of the water through the rolling of the vessel or by fluctuation of the water's surface. Any breach effected by a shot in this part is especially dangerous.

(2) Fig.: Any part or point generally where a blow or attack will most effectually injure.

2. Down the wind:

(1) Lit.: In the direction of and moving with the wind.

(2) Fig.: Toward ruin, decay, or adversity.

"A man that had a great veneration for an image in his house, found that the more he prayed to it to prosper him in the world, the more he went down the wind still."—L'Estrange.

3. How (or which way) the wind blows (or lies):

(1) Lit.: The direction or velocity of the wind.

(2) Fig.: The position or state of affairs; how things are going on, or are likely to turn out.

"Indications are not wanting to show which way the wind blows."—Field, Oct. 17, 1885.

4. In the wind's eye; In the teeth of the wind: Toward the direct point from which the wind blows; in a direction exactly opposite to that of the wind.

5. Second wind: [SECOND-WIND.]

6. Three sheets in the wind: Tipsy, unsteady from drink. (Slang.) [SHEET, s., ¶ (1).]

7. To be in the wind: To be about or likely to happen; to be within the region of surmise or suspicion; as, There is something in the wind now. (Collog.)

8. To carry the wind:

Manège: To toss the nose as high as the ears. (Said of a horse.)

9. To get wind: [GET (2), v., ¶ 29, 30.]

*10. To have the wind of: To keep a strict watch on.

"My son and I will have the wind of you."

Shakesp.: Titus Andronicus, iv. 2.

11. To raise the wind: [RAISE, v., ¶ (7).]

12. To sail close to the wind:

(1) Lit. & Naut.: To sail with the ship's head as near to the wind as to fill the sails without shaking them; to sail as much against the direction of the wind as possible.

(2) Fig.: To border or act very closely upon dishonesty or indecency.

*13. To sow the wind and reap the whirlwind: To act wrongly and recklessly with the result of future punishment for such conduct. (Hosea viii. 7.)

*14. To take wind: To get wind (q. v.).

"The design . . . might have taken wind."—North: Life of Lord Guilford, i. 101.

15. To take the wind out of one's sails: To circumvent; to get or take an advantage of, as by one vessel sailing between the wind and another vessel.

*16. Wind of a ball: [WIND-CONTUSION.] wind-band, s.

1. A band of musicians who play only or principally on wind-instruments.

2. The part of an orchestra which consists of wind-instruments.

wind-barrow, s. [WIND-CARRIAGE.]

wind-beam, s.

Build.: Formerly a cross-beam used in the principals of roofs, occupying the situation of the collar in modern king-post roofs.

wind-berry, s.

Bot.: Vaccinium myrtillus.

wind-bill, s.

Scots Law: An accommodation bill; a bill of exchange granted, without value having been received by the acceptors, for the purpose of raising money by discount.

wind-bore, s.

1. Ord. Lang.: The extremity of the suction-pipe of a pump, usually covered with a perforated plate to prevent the intrusion of foreign substances.

2. Min.: The pump at the bottom of a set of pumps.

wind-break, v. t. To break the wind of.

"I would wind-break a mule to vie burdens with her."—Ford. (Annandale.)

wind-broken, a. Broken-winded (q. v.).

wind-car, wind-barrow, subst. A car or barrow driven wholly or partially by the wind. The Chinese have sails on barrows, to be used when the wind is favorable.

wind-changing, a. Changing like the wind; fickle, inconstant.

"Wind-changing Warwick now can change no more."
Shakesp.: Henry VI., Pt. III., v. 1.

wind-chest, s.

Music: An air-tight box in an organ or other wind-instrument played by keys, into which the air is received from the wind-trunk, and from which air is admitted by valve-ways through the channels of the sound-board, to the air-ducts communicating with the respective pipes.

†wind-contusion, s.

Milit. Surg.: A name formerly applied to any internal injury produced by a shot or bullet without any external mark of violence, the injury itself being erroneously attributed to what was called "the wind of the ball," i. e., air violently displaced by the velocity of a projectile. It is now known that such injuries are produced either by spent balls or by projectiles striking the body at an oblique angle, when the skin does not always give way, though deep-seated structures, such as the muscles, or large organs, as the liver, may be completely ruptured or crushed.

wind-cutter, s.

Music: In an organ-pipe, the lip or edge against which the issuing sheet of air impinges. The vibration thereby imparted is communicated to the column of air in the pipe, producing a musical note whose pitch is determined by the length of the pipe, the quality of the tone by the size of the pipe and the material of which it is made, &c.

wind-dropsy, s. A swelling of the belly from wind in the intestines; tympanitis.

wind-egg, s. An imperfect egg; such eggs are often produced by hens which have been injured or are growing old. They are frequently destitute of a shell, being surrounded only by a skin or membrane, or sometimes by a very thin shell.

"Sound eggs sink, and such as are addled swim; as do also those termed hyponemia, or wind-eggs."—Browne: Vulgar Errors. (Todd.)

wind-flower, s.

Bot.: (1) The genus Anemone (q. v.). (2) Gentiana pneumonanthe. It has an upright stem four to six or eight inches high, and terminal or axillary flowers deep blue, with five broad greenish lines. It grows in moist heathy places in several parts of England. Called also Marsh Gentian. [GENTIAN.] wind-furnace, s. A blast-furnace (q. v.).

wind-gall, s. A soft tumor on the fetlock joints of a horse.

"His horse . . . full of wind-galls and railed with spavins."—Shakesp.: Taming of the Shrew, iii. 2.

wind-gauge, †wind-gage, s.

1. An instrument for measuring the velocity and force of the wind; an anemometer (q. v.).

2. An apparatus or contrivance for measuring or indicating the amount of the pressure of wind in the wind-chest of an organ.

wind-god, s.

Anthrop.: A deity presiding over the wind. This might be one of the principal gods, as Æolus, of classic mythology (Homer's Odyssey, x., Virgil's Æneid, i.), with minor deities subject to him; or one of the minor deities, as among the North American Indians of the present day. (See Longfellow's Song of Hiawatha.)

"In the polytheism of the lower as of the higher races, the wind-gods are no unknown figures."—Tylor: Prim. Cult. (ed. 1873), ii. 266.

wind-gun, s. A gun discharged by the force of compressed air; an air-gun. (Pope: Dunciad, i. 181.)

wind-hatch, s.

Mining: The opening or place where the ore is taken out of the earth.

wind-hole, s.

Min.: A shaft or sump sunk to convey air; an air-shaft.

wind-instrument, s.

Music: An instrument played by wind forced into pipes or through reeds, by means of bellows, or directly from the mouth of the performer. An organ contains both flute (flue) and reed pipes; harmoniums and American organs contain free-reeds. Flutes, oboes, clarinets, and bassoons in an orchestra are called the wood-wind in opposition to the brass wind-instruments, such as trumpets, horns, and trombones.

wind-mill, s. [WINDMILL.] bōil, bōy; pōut, jōwl; cat, çell, chorus, çhin, bench; go, gem; thin, this; sin, aš; expect, Xenophon, exist. ph = f

-cian, -tian = shān. -tion, -sion = shūn; tion, -sion = zhūn. -tious, -cious, -sious = shūs. -ble, -dle, &c. = bel, del.

wind-plant, s.

Bot.: Anemone nemorosa.

wind-pump, s. A pump driven by a wind-wheel.

wind-rode, a.

Naut.: The same as TIDE-RODE (q. v.).

wind-rose, s.

1. Ord. Lang.: A card or table, with lines corresponding to the points of the compass, showing the connection of the wind with the barometer, &c.

2. Bot.: (1) Rœmeria hybrida. [Rœmeria.] (2) Papaver argemone, a British poppy with small flowers, having narrow scarlet petals and a clavate capsule, hispid, with erect bristles.

wind-row, s.

1. A row or line of hay raked together for the purpose of being rolled into cocks or heaps; also sheaves of corn set up in a row one against another, in order that the wind may blow between them.

"The grasse . . . must be tedded, brought into wind-rows, and turned eftsoones with the sunne."—P. Holland: Pliny, bk. xviii. ch. xxviii.

2. The green border of a field dug up in order to carry the earth on other land to mend it.

3. A row of peats set up for drying, or a row of pieces of turf, sod, or sward, cut in paring and burning.

wind-row, v. t. To rake or gather into wind-rows.

wind-sail, s.

1. Naut.: A canvas tube used as a wind-conductor, having its open mouth presented toward the wind, or in the direction of motion, as on board a steamship, where it is used to direct a current of air down into the engine-room to moderate the intense heat and improve the draught of the fires. The wind-sail is used quite commonly on ships to ventilate and cool the cabins and "tween decks," especially on board vessels in tropical climates.

2. One of the vanes or sails of a windmill.

Wind-sail.

wind-shake, *wind-shock, s.

Veg. Pathol.: Anemosis, a condition of timber which has caused it to part asunder at the circular lines of junction connecting the several zones of wood. The defect is not discovered till the timber is felled, for there is no external evidence of its existence. Wind-shake is popularly attributed to the agitation produced by violent winds, but Berkeley thinks it more probable that it arises from lightning or from frost.

"The wind-shock is a bruise and shiver throughout the tree, though not constantly visible."—Evelyn: Sylva.

wind-shaked, a. Driven and agitated by the wind.

"The wind-shaked surge."—Shakesp.: Othello, ii. 1.

wind-shaken, a. Trembling and tottering in the wind.

"The oak not to be wind-shaken."

Shakesp.: Coriolanus, v. 2.

wind-side, s. The windward side.

wind-sucker, s.

1. Lit. & Ornith.: A windhover (q. v.).

2. Fig.: A person ready to pounce on any person or on any blemish or weak point.

wind-swift, a. Swift as the wind.

"Therefore hath the wind-swift Cupid wings."

Shakesp.: Romeo and Juliet, ii. 5.

wind-tight, a. So tight as to exclude the wind.

"Cottages not high built, yet wind-tight and water-tight."—Bp. Hall: Remains, p. 46.

wind-trunk, s.

Music: The air-duct which conducts air from the bellows to the wind chest of an organ or similar instrument.

wind-way, s.

Mining: A passage for air.

wind-wheel, s. A wheel acted upon by the wind and used to communicate power. Among its familiar applications are the wind-mill, wind-pump, and anemometer.

wind-worn, a. Worn or battered by the wind or weather.

"Its wind-worn battlements are gone."

Byron: Child Harold, iii. 22.

wind (2), s. [WIND (2), v.] A winding, a turning, a bend; as, The road takes a wind to the right.

wind (1) (pa. t. winded), v. t. [WIND (1), s.]

1. To give wind to with the mouth; to blow; to sound by blowing.

"Each to Loch Ranza's margin spring:

That blast was winded by the King!"

Scott: Lord of the Isles, iv. 18.

¶ In this sense the word is pronounced wînd, and the pa. t. is commonly wound, through confusion with WIND (2), v.

2. To perceive or follow by the wind or scent; to scent; to nose, as a hound.

"Unluckily they heard or winded us before we saw them."—Field, Feb. 11, 1888.

3. To expose to the wind; to winnow, to ventilate.

4. To drive, ride, or cause to run fast, so as to render scant of wind or breath; to put out of breath.

5. To rest, as a horse, so as to enable him to recover his breath or wind; to breathe.

¶ To wind a ship:

Naut.: To bring it round until the head occupies the place where the stern was, so that the wind may strike the opposite side.

wind (2) (pa. t. wand*, wond*, winded*, wound, pa. par. wound, wonde*, wunden*, v. t. & i.) [A. S. windan (pa. t. wand, wond, pa. par. wunden); cogn. with Dut. winden; Icel. vinda; Dan. vinde; Sw. vinda=to squint; O. H. Ger. wintan; Ger. winden (pa. t. wand, pa. par. gewunden); Goth. windan (in composition). From the same root come wend, wander, wonder, wand, &c.]

Nautical: A purchase of one fixed three-sheave block, and a movable double or treble block, suspended from a lower-mast head, and used in getting in or off heavy freight, stores, or armament.

wind'-īng-lŷ, adv. [Eng. winding; -ly.] In a winding, circuitous, or meandering manner.

wind-lāss (1), wind-ase, wind-as, wind-las, wind-lasse, wynd-ace, s. [The spelling is a corruption due to popular etymology (as if from wind (2), v., and lace), and to confusion with wind-lāss (2), s. (q. v.). From Icel. vindlāss=a windlass, lit.=a winding-pole, from vinda=to wind, and ass=a pole, rafter, yard of a sail, &c.; cogn. with Dut. windas, and O. Dut. windaes=a windlass. The lis therefore excrement, and may have crept in through the influence of windle (q. v.).]

1. A machine for raising weights, such as coals, from a pit, consisting of a cylinder or roller moving on an axle supported on a frame, and turned by levers inserted in square holes cut in the cylinder, or by a crank fitted on to one or both ends of the axle. The end of a rope or chain is attached to the cylinder, and the other to the weight, which is raised by the rope being shortened in passing round the roller. Smaller hoisting engines turned by cranks are called winches. [WINCH (1), s.] The windlass used on board ships for raising the anchor or obtaining a purchase on other occasions, consists of a large horizontal roller journaled in standards (windlass-bitts), and rotated by handspikes or other means. It differs from the capstan principally in the horizontality of its axis. The windlass is a modification of the wheel and axle (q. v.).

"The windlass is a sort of large roller, used to wind in the cable or heave up the anchor."—Falconer: Shipwreck, ch. i., note 3.

2. A handle by which anything is turned; specifically, a winch-like contrivance for bending the arblast, or crossbow (q. v.).

"The arblast was a crossbow, the windlace the machine used in bending that weapon."—Scott: Ivanhoe, ch. xxviii. (Note.)

windlass-bitts, s. [WINDLASS (1), s., 1., BITT.]

wind-lāss (2), wind-lace, wind-lasse, wind-lesse, s. [Apparently compounded of wind (2), and lace, the old sense of which was a snare or bit of twisted string.]

1. A circuit; a circular way, route, or course; a circle, a compass.

"Bidding them fetch a windlasse a greate waye about."—Goldinge: Caesar, fol. 206.

2. Any indirect or artful course; art and contrivance; indirect advances; shift, subtleties.

"And thus do we of wisdom and of reach,
With windlases and with assays of bias."

Shakesp.: Hamlet, ii. 1.

wind'-lāss (1), v. t. or i. [WINDLASS (2), s.] To use a windlass; to raise something by, or as by a windlass.

"None of our windlassing will ever bring her up."—Miss Edgeworth: Helen, ch. xiv.

wind'-lāss (2), v. i. [WINDLASS (2), s.]

1. To take a circuitous path; to fetch a compass.

"A skilful woodsman by windlassing presently gets a shoot, which, without taking a compass. . . he could never have obtained."—Hammond.

2. To adopt an indirect, artful, or cunning course; to have recourse to shifts or subtleties.

"She is not so much at leisure as to windlass or use craft to satisfy them."—Hammond.

wīn'-dle, wīn'-dēl, s. [A. S. windel=a woven basket, a reel, from windan=to wind (q. v.).]

*1. A winch, wheel and axle, or windlass.

2. A kind of reel; a turning-frame upon which yarn is put to be wound off. (Scott: Pirate, ch. vii.)

windle-strae, windle-strow, s. [A. S. windel-streow, from windel, and streow=straw (q. v.).]

Botany:

1. Crested dog's-tail grass; bent grass.

"I had rather that the rigs of Tillietudlem bare nothing but windle-straes."—Scott: Old Mortality, ch. vii.

2. (Pl.): The old stalks of various species of grass (Britten & Holland), specially (1) Cynosurus cristatus, (2) the Spreading Silky Bent Grass (Agrostis or Apera spica-venti).

wind-lēss, wind-lesse, a. [Eng. wind (1), s.; -less.]

1. Free from or unaffected by wind; calm, smooth.

2. Wanting or having lost the wind; out of breath; breathless.

wind'-lift, s. [Prob. from Eng. wind (2), v., and lift.] A windlass.

"The author intends no good in all this, but brings it in as a windlift to heave up a gross scandal."—North: Examen, p. 354.

wind'-mill, wind-mulle, wynd-mylle, subst. [Eng. wind (1), s., and mill.]

1. Lit.: A mill which receives its motion by the wind acting on sails, and which is used for grinding grain, raising or pumping water, and other purposes. When wind is employed as the first mover of machinery, it may be applied in two ways: (1) By receiving it upon sails which are nearly vertical, and which give motion to an axis nearly horizontal, in which case the machine is called a vertical wind-mill; or (2) by receiving it upon vertical sails which move in a horizontal plane, and give motion to a vertical axis, in which case it is called a horizontal wind-mill. Sometimes the whole mill is made to turn upon a strong vertical post, and is then called a post mill; but more commonly the roof or head (F) only revolves, carrying with it the wind-wheel and its shaft, this weight being supported on friction rollers. In the cut, which is a section of the upper part of a vertical windmill, the sails or vanes AA are attached by the frames to the extremities of the principal axis or wind-shaft (B), which is set nearly horizontally, so that the sails revolve in a plane nearly vertical, and give motion to the driving-wheel (C), which in its turn communicates motion to the shaft (D) and the machinery connected with it. As it is necessary that the extremity of the wind-shaft must always be placed so as to point to the quarter from which the wind blows, a large vane or weather-cock (E) is placed on the side which is opposite the sails, thus turning them always to the wind. But in large mills the motion is regulated by a small supplementary wind-wheel, a pair of sails occupying the place of the vane, and situated at right angles to the principal wind-wheel. When the windmill is in its proper position with the shaft parallel to the wind, these supplementary sails do not turn; but when the wind changes they are immediately brought into action, and, by turning a series of wheel-work, they gradually bring round the head to its proper position. On account of the inconstant nature of the motion of the wind, it is necessary to make some provision for accommodating the resistance of the sails to the degree of violence with which the wind blows. This is done by clothing and unclothing the sails; that is, by covering with canvas or thin boards a greater or smaller portion of the frame of the sails according to the force of the wind.

Section of Upper Part of Windmill.

*2. Fig.: A visionary project or scheme, a fancy; a chimera.

"He lived and died with general councils in his pate, with windmills of union to concord Rome and England, England and Rome, Germany with them both."—Hacket: Life of Williams, i. 102.

windmill-cap, s. The movable upper story of the wind-wheel which turns to present the sails in the direction of the wind.

windmill-plant, s.

Bot.: Desmodium gyrans.

windmill-propeller, s. An application of a wind-wheel to the propulsion of a boat.

wind'-mil-lŷ, a. [Eng. windmill; -y.] Abounding with windmills.

"A windmilly country this, though the windmills are so damp and rickety."—Dickens: Uncommercial Traveller, xxv.

wīn'-dōre, s. [Eng. wind (1), s., and dore=door, from an idea that window was a corruption of these words.] A window.

"Nature has made man's heart no windores

To publish what he does within doors."

Butler: Hudibras, I. ii. 214.

wīn'-dōw, wīn-dowe, wīn-doge, wīn-dohē, wyn-dow, wyn-dowe, s. [Lit. wind-eye, i. e., an eye or hole for the wind to enter at; an opening for air and light (cf. A. S. ēagdura=eye-door). From Icel. vindauga=a window, lit.=wind-eye, from vindr=wind, and auga=an eye; cogn. with Dan. vindere=a window; cf. vind=wind, and ōie=an eye.]

I. Lit. & Arch.: An opening in the wall of a building, originally for ventilation; afterward an aperture for the admission of light, protected by mica, oiled linen, horn-paper, or glass. In modern houses this opening is usually capable of being opened and shut, either by casements or sashes, except in the case of large shops, or the like. The sashes contain panes of glass, which are made of various sizes, and slide in frames. [DOUBLE-WING, DOUBLE-WINDOW, JAMB, LINTEL, SILL.]

"But soft! what light through yonder window breaks?"
Shakesp.: Romeo and Juliet, ii. 2.

II. Figuratively:

1. An aperture or opening resembling a window, or suggestive of a window.

"The window of my heart, mine eye."
Shakesp.: Love's Labor's Lost, v. 2.

*2. The sash or other thing that covers an aperture.

"To thee I commend my watchful soul Ere I let fall the windows of mine eyes."
Shakesp.: Richard III., v. 3.

*3. A figure formed by lines crossing each other, as in a lattice-window.

"The favorite . . . makes great clatter, Till he has windows on his bread and butter."
King: On Cookery.

wine, *win, *wyn, *wyne, subst. [A. S. win, from Lat. vinum=wine; cogn. with Goth. wein; O. H. Ger. win; Icel. vin; Dut. wijn; Ger. wein; Sw. vin; Dan. viin; Gr. oinos=wine; oinē=the vine; O. Ir. fin=wine. From the same root as withy.]

I. Ordinary Language:

1. In the same sense as II.

2. The juice of certain fruits prepared in imitation of wine obtained from grapes, but distinguished by naming the source from whence obtained; as, gooseberry wine, currant wine, &c.

3. The unfermented juice of certain plants; as, palm wine.

*4. The effects of drinking wine in excess; intoxication.

"Noah awoke from his wine."—Genesis ix. 24.

*5. The act of drinking wine or intoxicating liquors.

"Who hath redness of eyes? They that tarry long at the wine."—Proverbs xxiii. 29, 30.

6. A wine party. (Eng. Univ. slang.)

"It is he who presides at the wine given to celebrate Jack's rise to the Peerage, though surely such a wine was never given at Oxford in any gentleman's room."—London Echo.

II. Technically:

	Per cent. by weight.		Per cent. by weight.
Port (average).....	16.20	Hock.....	9.60
Sherry.....	15.37	Hock, Rudesheimer.....	8.40
Madeira (strong).....	16.90	Claret.....	9.78
Marsala.....	14.60	Claret (Ordinaire)....	8.99
Sauterne.....	11.40	Gooseberry.....	9.50
Burgundy (average)....	11.20	Orange.....	9.00
Champagne.....	10.00	Elderberry.....	7.40

2. Pharm. (pl.): Medicinal preparations in some respects resembling wine. Sherry is generally employed as the menstruum. There is thus less alcohol in them than in tinctures (q. v.), but enough to prevent their decomposition.

¶ (1) Oil of wine: Ethereal oil, a reputed anodyne, but only used in the preparation of other compounds.

(2) Quinine wine: Sherry holding sulphate of quinine in solution.

(3) Spirit of wine: Alcohol (q. v.).

(4) Wine of iron (Vinum ferri): [STEEL-WINE.]

*wine-bag, s.

1. A wine-skin (q. v.).

2. A person who indulges frequently and to excess in wine. (Colloq.) wine-berry, wimberry, s.

Botany:

1. Various species of Ribes, spec. Ribes rubrum, R. nigrum, and R. grossularia. (Britten & Holland.)

2. Vaccinium vitis-idaea (Britten & Holland) and V. myrtillus. The last-named species is so called because wine was formerly made from it in England, as it still is in Russia. (Prior.) wine-biscuit, subst. A light biscuit served with wine.

wine-cask, s. A cask in which wine is or has been kept.

wine-cellar, s. An apartment or cellar for storing wine. They are generally underground in the basement of a house, so as to keep the wine cool, and at an equal temperature.

wine-colored, a. Vinaceous (q. v.).

wine-cooler, s. A tub or bath in which bottles of wine are surrounded by ice to render the contents more palatable in warm weather. They are made of various materials. An ordinary variety consists of a porous vessel of earthenware, which, being dipped in water, absorbs a considerable quantity of it. A bottle of wine being placed in the vessel, the evaporation which takes place from the vessel abstracts heat from the wine. Wine-coolers for the table are made of silver or plated metal, and have ice placed in them.

wine-fancier, s. A connoisseur of wines.

wine-fat, s. The vat or vessel into which the liquor flows from the wine-press.

"Wherefore art thou red in thine apparel, and thy garments like him that treadeth in the wine-fat?"—Isaiah lxiii. 2.

†wine-flask, s. A flask or bottle of wine.

"The wine-flask lying couched in moss."

Tennyson: In Memoriam, lxxxviii. 44.

wine-glass, s. A small glass from which wine is drunk.

wine-grower, s. One who cultivates a vineyard and makes wine; a proprietor of a vineyard.

wine-growing, s. The cultivation of vineyards for the purpose of making wine.

wine-heated, a. Affected or excited by wine. (Tennyson: Enid, 1,200.)

wine-making, s. The act or process of making wines.

wine-marc, s. [MARC (2), s.] (See extract.)

"For as many [grapes] as have lien among wine-marc, or the refuse of kernels & skins remaining after the presse, are hurtfull to the head."—P. Holland: Pliny, bk. xliii., ch. i.

wine-measure, s. An old English measure by which wines and spirits were sold. In this measure the gallon contained 231 cubic inches, and was to the imperial standard gallon as 5 to 6 nearly.

wine-merchant, s. A merchant who deals in wines.

wine-offering, s. A sacrificial offering of wine.

"With large wine-offerings pour'd, and sacred feast." Milton: P. L., xii. 21.

wine-overtaken, wine-o'ertaken, a. Intoxicated with wine.

"Now the Satyrs, changed to devils, Frighten mortals wine-o'ertaken."
Longfellow: Drinking Song.

wine-palm, s. Any palm from which palm-wine is obtained. [PALM-WINE.]

wine-press, s. A machine, apparatus, or place in which the juice is pressed out of grapes. The wine-press of the Bible was a vat, in which the juice was expressed by the feet of men who trampled the fruit therein, staining their legs and garments with the color of the must.

wine-sap, s. A much-esteemed American apple.

wine-skin, s. A bottle or bag of skin used in various countries for carrying wine (cf. Matt. ix. 17, Mark ii. 22, Luke v. 37).

wine-stone, s. A deposit of crude tartar or argal, which settles on the sides and bottoms of wine-casks.

wine-taster, s.

1. A person employed to taste and judge the quality, &c., of wines for purchasers.

2. A valinch (q. v.). A burette will answer for taking a sample from a bottle.

wine-vault, s.

1. A vault in which wine is stored in casks.

2. A name frequently assumed by public-houses where the wine and other liquors are served at the bar or at tables. (Generally in the plural form.)

"A peculiar fragrance was borne upon the breeze as if a passing fairy had hiccupped, and had previously been to a wine-vault."—Dickens: Martin Chuzzlewit, ch. xxv.

wine-warrant, s. A warrant to the keeper of a bonded warehouse for the delivery of wine. (Eng.)

wine-whey, subst. A mixture of wine, milk and water.

wine, v. t. [WINE, subst.] To supply or provide with wine.

wine'-bīb-bēr, subst. [Eng. wine, s., and bibber.] One who drinks much wine; a great drinker.

wine'-bīb-bīng, s. [Eng. wine, s., and bibbing.] The practice of indulging freely in wine.

"He was not content with lecturing and winebibbing, but must also take to conspiring."—G. H. Lewes: Hist. of Philosophy, ii. 41.

wine'-sōur, s. [Eng. wine, s., and sour (1).]

Bot. & Hort.: A variety of Prunus domestica, the Wild Plum.

wīng, *wenge, *winge, *wyng, *wyng, subst. [Icel. vængr = a wing; Dan. & Sw. vinge. A nasalized form from the same root as wag (q. v.).]

I. Ordinary Language:

1. Literally:

(1) In the same sense as II. 3.

(2) The act or manner of flying; passage by flying; flight.

"The crow makes wing to the rooky wood."

Shakesp.: Macbeth, iii. 2.

* (3) A bird.

"To whose sound chaste wings obey."

Shakesp.: Phenix and Turtle, 4.

2. Figuratively:

(1) Something which moves with a wing-like motion, or which receives a wing-like motion from the action of the air, as a fan used to winnow grain, the vane or sail of a windmill, the feather of an arrow, the sail of a ship, &c.

(2) Applied to the front leg or shoulder of some quadrupeds.

"Smile at our wing of a rabbit."—Fuller: Worthies; Norfolk, ii. 124.

(3) A leaf of a gate or double-door.

(4) Used emblematically of—

(a) Swiftmess, or of anything that carries the mind upward or along; means of flight or rapid motion; as, Fear lent wings to his flight.

(b) Care or protection. (Often used in the plural.)

"In the shadow of thy wings will I rejoice."—Psalm lxxiii. 7.

(5) A shoulder-knot or small epaulette.

II. Technically:

1. Architecture:

(1) A side projection of a building on one side of the central or main portion.

(2) A wing-wall (q. v.).

2. Bot.: [ALA, II. 1.]

3. Comparative Anatomy:

(1) One of the organs of flight in Insects. The wings, of which there are normally two pairs, are extensions of the thorax, developed from sac-like dilatations of the integument, which come in contact and adhere when the insect has arrived at maturity. They are traversed and supported by nervures. [NERVURE, 3.] The wings of Insects differ greatly in their character, and form a criterion for classification. [INSECTA.]

(2) One of the anterior limbs of Birds, which are homologous with the fore limbs of the Mammalia. The wing is supported by the arm (humerus), forearm (cubitus), and hand (manus), and is normally furnished throughout its length with a range of elastic quills greatly extending its surface and con-

1. a. Humerus; b. Cubitus; c. Ulna; d. Radius; e. Manus, or hand; f. Carpus; g. h. i. Metacarpus; k. Pollex, or thumb; l. Second digit; m. Third digit.

2. A. Feathers of the manus, or primary quills; B. Feathers of the cubitus, or secondary quills; C. Coverts of the manus, or primary-coverts; D. Lesser primary-coverts; E. Coverts of the cubitus, or secondary-coverts; F. Median coverts; G. Lesser coverts; H. Feathers of the thumb, or bastard wing.

sequent resistance to the air. In the vast majority of the Carinatae the wings are true organs of flight, but in the Impennes they are modified to serve as swimming organs, when the feathers with which they are covered closely resemble scales [PENGUIN, 1]; in the Ratitae they are mere aids in running, as in the ostriches, or are functionless, as in the Apterygidae.

(3) The term wing is loosely applied to the wing-membrane (q. v.) of Bats and of the extinct Pterodactyls. [PATAGIUM.]

4. Fort.: The longer side of a crown or horn work uniting it to the main work.

5. Geol.: One of the slopes of an anticlinal.

rotary motion is continuous, it becomes a wiper-wheel (q. v.), which may have a number of cams acting consecutively in the course of a revolution.

2. Small-arms: A worm or sponge.

wiper-wheel, s.

Mach.: A cam-wheel placed below the shank of a tilt-hammer to lift it periodically, allowing it to fall by its own weight. The motion is found in many other machines, such as stamping-mills for ore and stone, &c.

wire, *wier, *wir, *wyer, *wyr, *wyre, subst. [A. S. wir=a wire; cogn. with Icel. virr=wire; Sw. virre=to wind, to twist; cf. O. H. Ger. wiara, M. H. German wiere=an ornament of refined gold; Lat. viriae=armlets of metal; Icelandic viravirki=wire-work, filigree-work.]

1. A metallic rod, thread, or filament of small and uniform diameter. The largest size, numbered 0000, of the Birmingham wire-gauge, has a diameter of .0454 inch; but smaller sizes even than this, except when drawn out to considerable lengths, are generally known as bars or rods. Lead-wire for the manufacture of bullets may considerably exceed the above diameter. Wire is usually cylindrical, but it is also made of various other forms, as oval, half-round, square, and triangular, and of more complicated shapes for small pinions; for forming the pattern on blocks used in calico-printing, and for other purposes.

"With golden wire to weave her curled head."

Spenser: F. Q., III., viii. 7.

2. Used absolutely for telegraph wire, and hence, colloquially, applied to the telegraph itself; as, to send a message by wire.

3. Hence applied to a message sent by telegraph; a telegram; as, He sent me a wire. (Colloq.)

4. Used in hunting language for wire-fencing.

5. A pickpocket. (Slang.)

¶ Wire of Lapland: A shining slender substance made from the sinews of the reindeer, soaked in water, beaten and spun into thread. Being then coated with tin, it is used by the Laplanders to embroider their clothes. (Ogilvie.) wire-bent, s.

Bot.: Nardus stricta.

wire-bridge, s. A bridge suspended by cables made of wire.

wire-cartridge, s. A cartridge for fowling in which the charge of shot has wire ligaments.

wire-cloth, s. A fabric whose woof and weft are of wire; the size of the wire, the shape and sizes of the meshes, being adapted to the uses of the completed screen, sifter, or sieve, or the character of the machine in which it is to be used.

wire-edge, s. A thin wire-like edge, formed on a cutting tool by over-sharpening it on one side.

wire-fence, wire-fencing, s. A fence made of parallel strands of wire, generally galvanized, strained between upright posts placed at suitable distances apart. Of late years wire-fencing has to a considerable extent taken the place of the old hedge, board, and rail fences; being easily transferred from place to place, so as to inclose different portions of ground at different times as required. It also has the advantages of being durable and of overshadowing or occupying no cultivable ground. Usually the wire has, at intervals of about 18 inches, small barbs or prickles, which are intended to prevent cattle from running against or attempting to leap these fences. In the cattle-raising districts, however, barbed wire is objectionable for fences, as in many cases, when cattle have by accident run against these sharp points, serious wounds and great disfigurement have resulted, sometimes valuable animals dying from loss of blood before they are discovered.

wire-gauge, subst. A gauge for measuring the thickness of wire and sheet-metals. It is usually a plate of steel having a series of apertures around its edge, each corresponding in width to the diameter of wire of a certain number.

wire-gauze, subst. A fine, close quality in wire-cloth.

wire-grass, s.

Bot.: A name given to Eleusine indica and Poa compressa.

wire-grate, s. A grate or contrivance of fine wire-work, used to keep insects out of vineries, hot-houses, &c.

wire-grub, s. [WIRE-WORM.]

wire-guard, subst. A framework of wire-netting used as a guard in front of a fire.

wire-heel, s. A defect and disease in the feet of a horse or other beast.

wire-iron, s. Black rod-iron for drawing into wire. (Simmonds.) wire-mattress, s. A mattress having a web of wire-cloth or chain stretched in a frame for supporting a bed.

wire-micrometer, subst. A micrometer having spider lines of very fine wire across the field. The wires are arranged in parallel and intersecting series, and some are movable by screws. [MICROMETER-SCREW.]

wire-netting, s. A texture of wire coarser than wire-gauze and wire-cloth.

wire-puller, s. One who pulls the wires, as of a puppet, one who operates by secret means; one who, being himself behind the scenes and unknown, exercises a powerful influence, especially in political affairs; an intriguer.

"An obscure knot of local wire-pullers, who style themselves an association."—Observer, Sept. 27, 1885.

wire-pulling, s. The act of pulling the wires, as of a puppet; hence, secret influence or management; intrigue.

"Disgusted with the amount of wire-pulling which has been carried on of late by the numerous committees."—London Daily Telegraph.

wire-road, s. [WIRE-TRAMWAY.]

wire-rope, s. A collection of wires twisted or bound together, so as to act in unison in resisting a strain. It is composed of strands of untwisted hard wire laid spirally around a central core of hemp or wire; a number of these strands, without any additional twist being placed around a hempen core, form the rope.

wire-tapper, s. (See extract under WIRE-TAPPING.)

wire-tapping, s. A method of surreptitiously obtaining telegraphic news, by connecting wires with the telegraph lines, and establishing an intermediate station between two authorized stations of a company. It is an indictable offense, and is committed usually in order to obtain, ahead of publication, some information that can be turned to profit by the perpetrators, as for instance the fluctuations of distant stock markets or the results of foreign or distant races—upon which bets are generally taken up to the hour of publication.

"Wire-tappers have been busy during the last week making ready to fall on Joe Ullman's foreign book at the Hawthorne track, but Captain Waldo and his men put an end to their work yesterday and now John Meyers and a complete wire-tapping outfit are safely locked up at the track. Captain Waldo noticed a suspicious-looking man lurking about the track, inspecting the telegraph wires. Two policemen were detailed to watch him. After leaving the track the man was followed to the corner of Rebecca and 47th streets, where he entered a two-story house. When the officers returned, Captain Waldo and a few of his best men set out for the place, but on their arrival found it hard to gain an entrance. Finally their call was answered, and on entering the house a completely fitted telegraph office was found. The man in charge and all the tools were captured."—Chicago Record, September 8, 1894.

wire-tramway, s. A mode of conveyance by or upon a wire supported on posts. Called also Wire-road and Wire-way.

wire-twist, s. A kind of gun-barrel made of a ribbon of iron and steel, coiled around a mandrel and welded. The ribbon is made by welding together laminæ of iron and steel, or two qualities of iron, and drawing the same between rollers into a ribbon.

wire-way, s. [WIRE-TRAMWAY.]

wire-wheel, s. A brush-wheel made of wire, iron, or brass, instead of bristles, used for cleaning and scratching metals, preparatory to gilding or silvering, or matting polished metallic surfaces.

wire-work, s. Any kind of fabric made of iron.

wire-worker, s. One who manufactures articles from wire.

wire-worm, wire-grub, s. [WIREWORM.]

wire-wave, a. A term applied to a paper of fine quality and glazed, used chiefly for letter-paper.

"Wrapped up in hot-pressed and wire-wave paper."—Knox: Essay No. 174.

wire, v. t. & i. [WIRE, s.]

A. Transitive:

1. To bind with wire; to apply wire to; as, to wire a cork.

2. To put upon a wire; as, to wire beads.

3. To form of wire; to insert wire in.

"Almost every fence seems to be wired."—Field, April 4, 1885.

4. To snare by means of a wire; as, to wire birds. [WIRED.]

5. To send by telegraph, as a message; to telegraph.

"Scarcely had the news been wired from Newmarket."—London Daily Telegraph.

B. Intransitive:

*1. To flow in currents, as thin as wire.

"Then in small streams (through all the isle wiring)."—P. Fletcher: Purple Island, vi.

2. To communicate by means of the telegraph; to telegraph.

wire'-draw, *wier-draw, v. t. [Eng. wire, and draw.]

I. Ordinary Language:

1. Lit.: To form into wire, as a metal, by forcibly pulling through a series of holes, gradually decreasing in diameter.

*2. Figuratively:

(1) To draw out into length; to elongate.

(2) To draw or spin out to great length or tenuity; as, to wiredraw an argument.

(3) To draw by act or violence; to twist.

"Nor am I for forcing, or wiredrawing the sense of the text."—South: Sermons, vol. v., ser. ii.

II. Steam-eng. To draw off, as steam, through narrow ports, thus wasting part of its effect.

wire'-draw-ër, *wier-draw-er, s. [Eng. wire, and drawer.] One who draws metal into wire. (Chaucer: Test. Love, bk. iii.)

wire'-draw-ing, pr. par., a. & s. [WIREDRAW.]

A. & B. As pr. par. & particip. adj.: (See the verb.)

C. As substantive:

1. Lit.: The act or process of drawing metal into wire. The metal to be extended is first hammered into a bar or rod. The rods, from $\frac{1}{4}$ to $\frac{1}{2}$ inch in diameter, received from the rolling-mills in bundles, are heated and re-rolled in grooved rollers, one above the other, so that the rod runs from the first roll to the second, and so on, without reheating. The rollers run with great rapidity, reducing the rod to a coarse wire, which is then passed through the successive holes in the draw-plate, a flat piece of hard steel having holes corresponding to the various numbers or sizes of wire. The best are made of a combined plate of highly-tempered steel and wrought-iron. The holes are tapering, the smallest opening being on the steel side through which the wire first enters. [DRAW-PLATE.] Very fine gold and platinum wires, used for the spider-lines of telescopes, are formed by coating the metal with silver, which is then drawn down to a great tenuity, after which the silver coating is removed by nitric acid, leaving an almost invisible interior wire, which has been so attenuated that a mile in length weighed only a grain.

2. Fig.: The act of drawing out an argument or discussion to prolixity and attenuation by useless refinements, distinctions, disquisitions, and the like.

wire'-drawn, pa. par. & a. [WIREDRAW.]

A. As pa. par.: (See the verb.)

B. As adjective:

1. Ord. Lang.: Drawn out or extended to prolixity, as an argument, &c.

2. Steam: A term applied to the condition of steam when the pipes or ports leading to the cylinder have not sufficient carrying capacity.

wire'-less, a. [Eng. wire; -less.] Without a wire or wires.

wireless submarine-telephone, s. A device for signaling under the sea, by means of which persons on ships 12 miles apart may converse with one another without wires, lights, flags, whistles or fog-horns. In communicating from shore a large bell, sunk 30 feet in the sea, rings out the signals in response to pressure on the keys of an apparatus stationed above, with which its hammer is electrically connected. A special receiving and annunciating apparatus is used on the ships by means of which a bell 12 miles distant can not only be heard, but echoed on a large gong in the pilot-house. In place of the "sea bell," for sending out messages the ships have powerful gongs on the sides or bottom. The system was invented by Professor Elisha Gray and perfected by Arthur J. Mundy. It was in successful operation in Boston harbor, September, 1901.

wireless-telegraphy, s. Electric telegraphing without a wire or wires. [ELECTRIC-TELEGRAPH.]

wire'-wõrm, s. [Eng. wire, and worm.] [See def.]

Entom. & Agric.: The name given by farmers and others to a kind of Vermiform larva, long, slender, cylindrical, and somewhat rigid. Most wireworms are the larvæ of the Elateridæ. Some live in rotten stumps of trees, others gnaw roots of kitchen garden and other plants, cereals, grass on lawns, &c. Some of them live in the larva state for three years. One of the most common wireworms is the larva of Cataphagus sputator. The last segment of the body is long, entire, and wirelike. It is believed that the form of this species suggested the prefix wire in the name wireworm. It attacks the roots of lettuces, eating them as far as the collar, with the effect of killing the plant. Agriotes lineatus similarly devours the roots of the oat, causing the leaves to wither and the plant to die. The larva of Hemirhipus segetis feeds on the roots of plants with the same destructive effect. The rook, the domestic fowl, and the mole are natural foes of the wire-worms. The name is sometimes applied to the Lulidæ.

wir'-i-ness, s. [Eng. wiry; -ness.] The quality or state of being wiry.

wir'-ing, pr. par. or a. [WIRE, v.]

wiring-machine, s. An apparatus for securing a soda-water, beer, or other bottle while the cork is being wired.

wir'-rý, v. t. [WORRY, v.]

wir'-ý, *wier-y, *wir-ie, adj. [Eng. wir(e), s.; -y.]

1. Made of wire; like wire.

"Rending her yellow locks like wirie gold."

Spenser: Ruines of Time, 10.

2. Lean but sinewy; tough.

"Mounted on wiry station horses."—London Globe.

wis, adv. [See def.] A fictitious verb given in many dictionaries, with a pa. t. wist, and with the meanings to know, to be aware, to think, &c. The mistake arose from the adverb wis, ywis=certainly, in which the prefix (like most other prefixes) was frequently written apart from the rest of the word, and not infrequently the i was represented by a capital I, so that it appeared as I wis. Hence the I has been mistaken for the first personal pronoun and the verb wis created. [YWIS.]

wis-alls, wis-omes, s. [Etym. doubtful.] The leaves and tops of carrots and parsnips. (Prov.)

wis'-ard, s. [WIZARD.]

Wis-cōn'-sīn, s. [Am. Indian=the gathering of the waters. Named from the Wisconsin river.] A State of the U. S. A., nicknamed "the Badger State." Bounded W. by Iowa and Minnesota, N. by Lake Superior and the State of Michigan, and S. by Illinois. Area, 56,040 square miles. First settled by the French in the latter part of the 17th century. Territory organized in 1836. Admitted as a State May 29, 1848. The country is rolling prairie and forest land, without mountains. Chief products, cereals; rich in mines and quarries. Principal cities, Milwaukee, La Crosse, Oshkosh, Eau Claire, Sheboygan, and Madison, the capital.

wis'-dōm, *wis-dam, *wys-dome, *wyse-dome, s. [A. S. wisdom, from wis=wise, and suff. -dōm=Eng. doom=judgment; Icel. visdóm; Sw. visdom; Dan. visdom, vísdom.]

*I. Ordinary Language:

1. The quality or state of being wise; the power or faculty of seeing into the heart of things and of forming the fittest and best judgment in any matter presented for consideration; knowledge and the capacity to make due use of it; knowledge of or the capacity to discern the best ends and the best means; a combination of discernment, judgment, sagacity, or similar powers with knowledge, especially that knowledge which is gained from experience. (It is often nearly synonymous with discretion, sagacity, or prudence, and frequently it implies little more than sound common-sense, perfect soundness of mind or intellect, and hence is often opposed to folly.)

"Show your wisdom, daughter,
In your close patience."

Shakesp.: Measure for Measure, iv. 3.

2. Human learning, science, knowledge, erudition; knowledge of arts and sciences.

"Moses was learned in all the wisdom of the Egyptians."—Acts vii. 22.

*3. Quickness of intellect; readiness of apprehension; dexterity in execution.

"In the hearts of all that are wise hearted I have put wisdom that they may make all that I have commanded thee."—Exodus xxxi. 7.

*4. Natural instinct and sagacity.

"God hath deprived her [the peacock] of wisdom, neither hath he imparted to her understanding."—Job xxxix. 17.

*5. With a possessive pronoun, used as a title of respect. (Cf. your highness, your worship, &c.)

"Under such a religious orderly Government as your Wisdoms, upon the abolishing of Episcopacy, shall please to erect among us."—W. Prynn: Antipathie, pt. 11.

II. Script.: Right judgment concerning religious and moral truth; true religion; piety; the knowledge and fear of God and sincere and uniform obedience to his commands.

"So teach us to number our days, that we may apply our hearts unto wisdom."—Psalms xc. 12.

¶ (1) The Wisdom of Solomon:

Apocrypha: An apocryphal book, named in Gr. Sophia Salōmōn, or Salomōntos, generally placed sixth in order between "the rest of Esther" and Ecclesiasticus. Its author professes that he is a king (vii. 1-6; ix. 7), and son of a worthy father, also a king (12). He himself prayed to God for wisdom and received it, wealth being superadded (vii. 7-13). God directed him to build a temple on the holy mount on the model of the Tabernacle (ix. 8), from all which it is obvious that the author claims to be Solomon, the son of David, King of Israel. The book is now divided into nineteen chapters. The first of these exhorts judges to love righteousness, and commends wisdom to them and others. The second denounces the unbelief of the ungodly, and traces to this source the wickedness of their lives. The third, fourth, and fifth point out that for the righteous there is a happy future, while an opposite destiny awaits the wicked. Chapters vi.-ix. highly commend wisdom. Portions of them resemble corresponding exhortations and descriptions in the Books of Proverbs (cf. Wisd. vi. 12-15, with Prov. viii. 17-21; ix. 9 with Prov. viii. 25-30). The advantages of wisdom are shown in chapters x.-xii. by illustrations taken from the history recorded in the Pentateuch (it is remarkable that the author adds no more modern examples). In chapters xiii.-xv. the folly of idolatry is exhibited in language of great beauty and force, and a philosophic explanation of its origin is attempted. (Cf. Wisd. xiii. 11-16 with Isaiah xlv. 12-20). The last four chapters contrast the providence which watches over the wise and the pious with the judgments which overtake idolaters and the ungodly, historical illustrations, as before, being derived solely from the Mosaic writings. Though the book is called "The Wisdom of Solomon," there is no reason to believe that he was its author. It was composed originally in Greek, probably by some Jew resident in Alexandria. It incorporates words from the Septuagint version of Isaiah iii. 10, xlv. 20 (circ. B. C. 284-246), and therefore was subsequent to that date. The Apostle Paul was evidently acquainted with this book (cf. Wisd. xiv. 21-27 with Rom. i. 19-32; Wisd. xv. 7 with Rom. ix. 21; Wisd. ix. 15 with 1 Cor. xv. 53, and 2 Cor. v. 1, and Wisd. v. 17-20 with Ephes. vi. 11-17). It is not influenced by Philo (B. C. 20 to A. D. 40 (?)) and in all likelihood was earlier than his era. Its more probable date was B. C. 150 to 50, or more approximately B. C. 120 to 80. If these dates are nearly correct, then Wisdom is the most ancient Jewish book except Daniel (xii. 2, 3), in which the doctrine of rewards and punishments in a future state is clearly set forth; but it differs from Daniel in teaching the immortality of the soul, without reference to the resurrection of the body. It is the first book which identifies the serpent which tempted Eve with the Devil (cf. Wisd. ii. 24 with Gen. iii. 1-5, 14, John viii. 44, and Rev. xii. 9, xx. 10). No one can study the Book of Wisdom without entertaining high respect for its author, and deriving profit from his ethical teachings. For thoughtful and beautiful sentiments see i. 4, 6; iv. 8, 9; vi. 18; xvii. 11, 12, &c.

(2) The Wisdom of Jesus, the son of Sirach:
Apocrypha: [ECCLESIASTICUS].

wisdom-tooth, subst. The popular name for the third molar in each jaw. [TOOTH, s., II. 1.] They appear between the ages of seventeen and twenty-five, when a person may be presumed to have attained some degree of experience or wisdom.

"He's noane cut his wisdom-teeth yet."—Mrs. Gaskell: Sylvia's Lovers, ch. xxi.

wise, *wis, *wys, *wyse, adj. & subst. [A. S. wis; cogn. with Dut. wijs; Icel. viss; Dan. vís; Sw. vis; O. H. Ger. wisi; Ger. weise; Goth. weis, in comp. unweis=unwise. From the same root as wit=to know; hence, a wise man=a knowing man, one full of knowledge.]

A. As adjective:

1. Having the power or faculty of discerning or judging correctly, or of discriminating and judging between what is true and what is false, between what is proper and what is improper; possessed of discernment, judgment and discretion; endowed with or showing sound judgment.

"What the wise powers deny us for our good."

Shakesp.: Antony and Cleopatra, ii. 1.

2. Discreet, sagacious, prudent, sensible.

"Five of them [the ten virgins] were wise, and five of them were foolish."—Matthew xxv. 2.

3. Characterized by sound judgment, discernment, or discrimination; dictated or guided by wisdom; containing wisdom; judicious; as, a wise act, a wise saying.

4. Becoming or befitting a wise man; sage, grave, serious, solemn.

"Our rising, eminent

In wise deport, spake much of right and wrong."

Milton: P. L., xi. 666.

5. Learned, erudite, knowing, enlightened.

6. Practically or experimentally knowing or acquainted; experienced, versed, skilled, dexterous, skillful.

"In these nice sharp quilllets of the law, Good faith, I am no wiser than a daw."

Shakesp.: Henry VI., Pt. I, ii. 4.

7. Calculating, crafty, cunning, subtle, warp, wily, "He taketh the wise in their own craftiness."—Job v. 13.

8. Godly, pious, religious.

"It thundered and lightened in most fearful wise."—Bunyan: Pilgrim's Progress, pt. 1.

¶ As an independent word wise is now obsolete, except in such phrases as in any wise, in no wise on this wise, &c.

"He shall in no wise lose his reward."—Matthew x. 42.

In composition it is often used, as in likewise, otherwise, lengthwise, when it has the same force as ways, as lengthways.

*¶ To make wise: To make show or pretense; to pretend, to feign.

"They made wise as if the gods of the woods . . . should appear and recite those verses."—Puttenham: English Poesie.

wise, v. i. [Etym. unknown.] To lean from the perpendicular, as a spinning top while spinning.

wise'-ā-cre (cre as kēr), s. [O. Dut. wijssegger=a wise-sayer, from Ger. weissager, from M. H. Ger. wizagōn, wizsagen, wissagen=a soothsayer, a prophet, from wizago=a prophet, from O. H. Ger. wizan; A. S. witan (Lat. video)=to see. Hence the true meaning is a soothsayer; the O. H. Ger. wizago corresponding to A. S. witega, witiga=a prophet.]

*1. A learned or wise man; a sayer of wise things. "Pythagoras lerned muche, . . . becomming a myghtye wyseacre."—Leland.

2. One who makes pretensions to great learning or wisdom; hence, contemptuously or ironically, a would-be wise person, a fool, a simpleton.

"There were, at that time, on the bench of justices many Sir Paul Eithersides, hard, nnfeeling, superstitious wyseacres."—Ben Jonson: The Devil is an Ass, v. 5. (Note 1.)

wise'-līng, s. [Eng. wise; dimin. suff. -ling.] One who pretends to be wise; a wise-acre.

"These wiselings, that show themselves fools in so speaking."—Donne: Septuagint, p. 214.

wî'-sēr-ine, wî'-sēr-ite (w as v), s. [After Herr Wiser of Zurich; suff. -ile (Min.).]

Mineralogy:

1. A name given by Kennigott to a mineral occurring in small square prisms with square pyramids implanted on crystals of iron-glance ("eisenrose"). The same as XENOTIME (q. v.).

2. A mineral occurring in somewhat complex crystal-forms sent to Klein under this name was found to be Anatase (q. v.). Found implanted on the sides of fissures of the schists of the Binnenthal, Wallis, Switzerland.

3. The same as RHODOCHROSITE (q. v.).

wish, *wische, *wisshe, v. i. & t. [A. S. wýscan, wiscan=to wish, from wisc=a wish (q. v.); cogn. with Dut. wenschen; Icel. æskja; Dan. ønske; Sw. onska; O. H. Ger. wunscan; Ger. wünschen. An n appears therefore to have been lost from the English word, the proper form of which should be winsh. From the same root as Sansc. van=to ask; English win (q. v.).]

A. Intransitive:

1. To have a wish or desire; to cherish a desire, either for what is, or for what is not supposed to be attainable; to long. (Followed by for before the object desired.)

"The sweets we wish for."

Shakesp.: Rape of Lucrece, 867.

2. To be disposed or inclined; to have certain feelings (with well or ill); as, He wishes well (or ill) toward you.

*3. To hope or fear in a slight degree, or with a preponderance of fear over hope.

"I wish it may not prove some ominous foretoken of misfortune, to have met with such a miser as I am."—Shakespeare.

B. Transitive:

1. To desire; to long for.

"I would not wish any companion."

Shakesp.: Tempest, iii. 1.

2. Followed by an infinitive or clause.

"I wish above all things that thou mayest prosper."—John 2.

"Thy wish was father, Harry, to that thought."

Shakesp.: Henry IV., Pt. II., iv. 4.

2. An expression of desire; a request, a petition; an expression of a kind interest in the welfare of others, or an imprecation upon them.

"Blistered be thy tongue,

For such a wish."

Shakesp.: Romeo and Juliet, iii. 2.

3. That which is desired or wished for; the object of desire.

"Be assur'd

Thy wish, exactly to thy heart's desire."

Milton: P. L., viii. 451.

II. Compar. Relig.: A word often occurring in ancient Teutonic mythology, and used to signify the sum-total of well-being and blessedness, the fullness. In the Middle Age Wish (Wunsch) appears to have been personified by the poets as a mighty creative being. (See extract.)

"That Wish was personified, and very boldly by the Christian poets, is abundantly proved. That he was ever believed in as a person, even in heathen times, is, to my thinking, far from clear. I believe some German scholars regard the notion as little better than a mare's nest."—Grimm: Deut. Mythol. (Eng. ed.), i. 143. (Translator's note.)

wish-bone, s. [WISHING-BONE.]

wish-child, s.

Anthropology:

1. An adopted child.

2. The child of a wish-wife (q. v.). (Grimm.)

wish-maiden, s.

wish'-îng, pr. par., a. & s. [WISH, v.]

A. & B. As pr. par. & particip. adj.:

1. Ord. Lang.: (See the verb.)

2. Anthrop.: Connected with or bestowed by Wish [WISH, s., II.]; bestowing the best that the heart can wish. The expression is borrowed from Scandinavian and Teutonic mythology, though the idea is found in the folk-tales of many other races. Grimm (Deut. Mythol.) identifies the wishing purse of Fortunatus, which was never empty, with the Cornucopia; his wishing cap, which transported him from place to place, with the petasus of Hermes; and in the wishing rod, credited with the power of enabling its owner to discover and obtain gold or other treasure buried in the earth, he sees a reference to the Caduceus.

C. As subst.: A wish, a desire; the expression of a wish.

"Her longings, wishings, hopes, all finished be."

Davies: Immort. of the Soul, xxx.

wis-tār'-i-a, subst. [Named after Caspar Wistar (1761-1818), Professor of Anatomy in the University of Pennsylvania.]

Bot.: A genus of Galegeæ. Climbing shrubs, with pinnate leaves, and axillary and terminal racemes of lilac-colored flowers. Two species are best known, Wistaria chinensis, from China, and W. frutescens, from North America.

wiste, pret. & pa. par. of v. [WIT, v.]

wist'-fûl, a. [A word of doubtful origin. According to Skeat it is nothing more than a corruption of wishful, which was once common, and which it has supplanted. The change in form is probably due to confusion with wistly, which was itself a corruption of Mid. Eng. wisly (q. v.).]

1. Earnestly or eagerly attentive; carefully or anxiously observant.

"These wistful myriads eye their prey."

Scott: Don Roderick, Conc. v.

2. Full of thought; pensive, contemplative, thoughtful.

"Why, Grubbinol, dost thou so wistful seem?"

Gay: Pastorals, Friday 1.

wit, wit-en, witte, wy-ten, (pr. t. wot, wost, wot; pl. witen; pa. t. wist*, wiste*, wyst*, wot*, pa. par. wist), v. i. or t. [A. S. witan=to know (pr. t. ic wát, thú wást, he wát; pl. witon; subj. sing. wite, pl. witon; pa. t. wiste, wisse; 2d pers. wisses, pl. wiston; pa. par. wist). Allied to witan=to see (pa. t. wite, pl. witon). It is clear that ic wát is really an old past tense (prob. of witan), used as a present, causing the necessity of creating a new past tense, wisse, or wiste which is, however, of great antiquity. . . . The gerund is tó witanne, whence Mod. English to wit. Cogn. with Dut. weten (p. t. wist, pa. par. geweten); Icel. vita (pr. t. veit; pa. t. vissa; pa. par. vitadhr); Dan. vide (pr. t. veed; pa. t. vidste; pa. par. vidst); Sw. veta (pr. t. vet; pa. t. visste; pa. par. veten); Ger. wissen (pr. t. weiss; pa. t. wusste; pa. par. gewusst); Goth. witan (pr. t. wait; pa. t. wissa); Lat. video=to see; Gr. idein=to see; oida=I know; Sausc. vid=to perceive, to know. Wit is the infin. mood; to wit (as in "We do you to wit") is the gerund; wot is the 1st and 3d pers. of the present indicative, the 3d person being often corruptly written wotteth; wost (later form wottest) is the 2d pers. sing. of the same tense; wiste (later wist), is the pa. t., and wist is the pa. par. (Skeat).]

1. To know, to learn; to be or become aware. (Used either with or without an object.)

(1) Infinitive:

"And his sister stood afar off to wit what would be done unto him."—Exodus ii. 4.

2) Present tense:

"I wot well where he is."

Shakesp.: Romeo and Juliet, iii. 2.

(3) Past tense:

"He wist not what to say, for they were all afraid."—Mark ix. 6.

(4) Present participle:

"As witting I no other comfort have."

Shakesp.: Henry VI., Pt. I., ii. 5.

¶ To wit is used chiefly to call attention to something particular, or as introductory to a detailed statement of what has just before been mentioned generally, and as equivalent to namely; as, There were three present, to wit, Mr. Green, Mr. Black, and Mr. Brown.

*2. To joke.

"Bristow doth pretend to wit it on his pulpit-libell."—Heylin: Life of Laud, p. 260.

wit, witte, wyt, s. [A. S. wit=knowledge, from witan=to know; cogn. with Icel. vit; Dan. vid; Sw. vett; O. H. German wiggi; German witz.] [WIR, v.]

1. Ordinary Language:

*1. Knowledge, understanding.

"As concernynge maliciousnes, be chyldren, but in wyt be perfects."—1 Corinth. xiv. 20. (1551.)

2. The mental powers; intellect; intellectual power.

"My wit untrained in any kind of art."

Shakesp.: Henry VI., Pt. I., i. 2.

3. A superior degree of intelligence or understanding; bright reasoning powers; wisdom, sagacity.

"If I might teach thee wit, better it were, Though not to love, yet, love, to tell me so."

Shakesp.: Sonnet 140.

4. Common sense; sense.

"I have the wit to think my master is a kind of knave."—Shakesp.: Two Gentlemen, iii. 1.

5. Imaginative and inventive faculty; power of invention; contrivance, ingenuity.

"Past the wit of man to say what dream it was,"

Shakesp.: Midsummer Night's Dream, iv. 1.

6. The power of original combination under the influence of the imagination.

"Men who have a great deal of wit, and prompt memories have not always the clearest judgment, or deepest reason."—Locke: Hum. Underst., bk. ii., ch. xi.

7. The faculty of associating ideas in a new and ingenious, and at the same time natural and pleasing way, exhibited in apt language and felicitous combination of words and thoughts, by which unexpected resemblances between things apparently unlike are vividly set before the mind, so as to produce a shock of pleasant surprise; facetiousness.

"True wit is nature to advantage drest,

What oft was thought, but ne'er so well exprest.

Pope: Essay on Criticism, ii. 97.

¶ Perhaps the clearest definition of wit would be that it is a combination of ideas which creates a feeling of surprise at the unexpected congruity of things apparently incongruous. Hence it would seem to be the power of comparison that creates wit; but there are many unexpected combinations of this character, which, as Sydney Smith justly observes, would be witty if they were not sublime or beautiful. A strong sense of grandeur or beauty overpowers or takes away the sense of wit. He instances the idea in Campbell's Lochiel—"Coming events cast their shadows before"—which, as here marks, would be witty if it were not sublime. The awe and reverence awakened by the highest subjects connected with our faith also destroy the impression of wit; but in the works of many of our most eminent religious writers, and even in the Scriptures, may be found happy combinations, which, but for the sanctity of the subject, would awaken the sense of wit. An unexpected fitness, then, seems to form the essence of wit; and as the same writer we have referred to observes, among the uneducated and children the same kind of feeling is often awakened by a combination of things as well as of thoughts, such as the putting together of a puzzle. (Trench: Synonyms.)

8. One who has genius, fancy, or humor; a person of learning and refined ideas; an accomplished scholar.

"He did not, however, in the least affect the character of a wit or of an orator."—Macaulay: Hist. Eng., ch. vii.

9. In modern usage one distinguished or noted for bright or amusing sayings; a humorist.

"The wits and the Puritans had never been on friendly terms."—Macaulay: Hist. Eng., ch. iii.

10. (Pl.): The understanding, the intellect.

"His wits are not so blunt."

Shakesp.: Much Ado, iii. 5.

II. Technically:

1. Botany: (1) Hyoscyamus luteus; (2) Nicotiana rustica. (Britten & Holland.) [TOBACCO.]

2. Phrenol.: The faculty which disposes its possessor to mirthfulness. Alone, or in combination with other faculties, it produces the tendency to mirth, humor, satire, &c. Spurzheim classified it with the affective faculties. Gall and Combe considered it intellectual. It is situated on the upper part of the forehead, toward one side.

¶ 1. At one's wits' end: At a complete loss what further steps or measures to adopt; having exhausted the last known plan or contrivance.

"Now your counsels,

For I am at my wits' end."

Beaum. & Flet.: Mad Lover, iv.

*2. The five wits: An old expression, sometimes used for the five senses, but oftener defined common wit, imagination, fantasy, estimation, memory.

"My five wits nor my five senses can Dissuade one foolish heart from serving thee."

Shakesp.: Sonnet, 141.

wit-cracker*, s. One who breaks jests; a joker.

Shakesp.: Henry VI., Pt. II., iii. 2.

witch'-craft, witche-craft*, s. [A. S. wicce-craeft, from wicce=a witch, and craeft=craft, art.]

punishment for witchcraft was death, generally by burning. The number of people put to death in England has been estimated at about 30,000. Statutes were passed against witchcraft in the reigns of Henry VI., Henry VII. (1541), Elizabeth (1563), and James I. (1604). During the sitting of the Long Parliament 3,000 persons are said to have been executed on the charge of witchcraft. Judicial convictions were checked chiefly by the firmness of Judge Holt, who in about ten trials, from 1694 to 1701, charged the juries in such a manner as to cause them to bring in verdicts of acquittal.

The first law against witchcraft in Scotland was passed in 1563. The last victims in England were Mrs. Hickes and her daughter, nine years of age, executed in 1716, and the last in Scotland suffered in 1722. Prosecution for witchcraft was abolished both in England and Scotland by 9 George II., c. 5 (1736), which made all persons pretending to use the name punishable by imprisonment. By a subsequent Act, passed in the reign of George IV., they were made punishable as rogues and vagabonds. Witchcraft was first practiced in America in 1692 at Salem, Massachusetts. It broke out in the family of Mr. Parish, a minister. A company of girls had been in the habit of meeting a West Indian slave to study "black art." They suddenly began to act mysteriously, bark like dogs, and scream at something unseen. An old Indian servant was accused of bewitching them. The excitement spread and impeachments multiplied. A special court was formed to try the accused, and as a result the jails rapidly filled, and many were condemned to death. It was unsafe to express a doubt of a prisoner's guilt. Fifty-five persons suffered torture and twenty were executed. (Barnes' Popular History of the United States.) Witches were supposed to be able, with the assistance of the devil, not only to foretell events, but to produce mice and vermin, to deprive men and animals, by touching them or merely breathing on them, of their natural powers, and to afflict them with diseases, to raise storms, &c., to change themselves into cats and other beasts, &c. General assemblies of witches, called "Witches' Sabbaths," were held yearly, or oftener, at which they appeared entirely naked, and besmeared with an ointment made from the bodies of unbaptized infants. To these meetings they were supposed to ride from great distances on broomsticks, pokers, goats, hogs, or dogs, the devil taking the chair under the form of a goat. Here they did homage to their master, and offered him sacrifices of young children, &c., and practiced all sorts of license until cock-crowing. Neophytes were introduced to the devil at these meetings, and received his mark on their bodies, in token that they had sold their souls to him. [WALPURGIS-NIGHT.]

2. Power more than ordinary or natural; irresistible influence; fascination.

Eng. Hist.: Among the Anglo-Saxons the great national or general assembly which met annually or oftener, whenever the king kept his Christmas, Easter, or Whitsuntide, as well to do private justice as to consult upon public business. It was composed of the æthelings, or princes, ealdormen, or nobles, the large landowners, the principal ecclesiastics, &c. They formed the highest court of judicature in the kingdom, and their concurrence was necessary to give validity to laws, and treaties with foreign states. They had even power to elect the king, and if the throne passed to the heir of the late king, the new sovereign had to be recognized formally by the witenagemot at a meeting assembled for the purpose.

*wit'-f ūl, a. [Eng. wit, s.; and -full.] Full of wit, knowledge, or wisdom; wise; knowing; sensible.

* (14) At; in consequence of.

"I feel remorse in myself with his words."
Shakesp.: Henry VI., Pt. II., iv. 7.

¶ By, with, and through are closely allied in many of their uses, and it is difficult to lay down a rule by which their uses may be distinguished. For the difference between with and by, see By. Trench (Synonyms) further discriminates between them as follows:

"Whenever a certain effect is implied as proceeding from two causes, the remote and original cause is expressed by the use of by, and the immediate one by with. For instance: The tree was cut down by a woodman with an axe. If we said, by an axe, it would imply some free agency on the part of the axe. With a woodman, on the other hand, would imply that the woodman was an unconscious instrument in the tree's destruction. On the other hand, whenever a conscious agent is implied, we use the word by. In general, with is improper, not only when a conscious agent is supposed, but when the agent is personified to a certain degree in our own minds, from its action being apparently voluntary. By and with are often used when no agent is spoken of, but a certain object is said to be accomplished by certain means. But in this case, by implies that the means used are essential; with, only that they are useful in aiding our endeavors. Through is somewhat different from the other words mentioned. It often implies that the means used are the appointed channels for the conveyance of the object or advantage specified; as, I heard the news through such a person; I received a remittance through the bank."

¶ With Child: Pregnant; in the family way.

"She was found with child of the Holy Ghost."—Matthew i. 18.

with, s. [WITHE.]

†wolds, †woulds, s. [WELD.]

wōlf, *wolfe, *woulfe (pl. wolves), s. [A. S. wulf (pl. wulfas); cogn. with Dut. & Ger. wolf; Icel. úlfr (=vulfr); Dan. ulv; Sw. ulf; Goth. wulfs; Russ. volk; Gr. lukos; Lat. lupus; Sansc. vrika.]

I. Ordinary Language:

1. In the same sense as II. 3.

2. A small white maggot or worm which infests granaries.

3. A tubercular excrescence which rapidly eats away the flesh. [LUPUS.]

4. A term of opprobrium especially applied to a person noted for ravenousness, rapacity, cruelty, cunning, or the like.

"Rescued is Orleans from the English wolves."

Shakesp.: Henry VI., Pt. I., i. 6.

II. Technically:

1. Cotton-manuf.: A beating or opening machine, for tearing apart the tussocks of cotton as delivered in the bale. It is a preliminary operation, by which dust and trash are rendered separable and the fiber delivered in a more downy condition, so as to subsequently form a lap.

†2. Music:

(1) A term applied to the harsh, howling sound of certain chords of keyed instruments, particularly the organ, when tuned by any form of unequal temperament.

(2) A wolf-note (q. v.).

3. Zoölogy: Canis lupus, of which there are many varieties, by some authorities raised to specific rank, but the differences between them are slight and unimportant, and probably produced by climate and surroundings. The Common Wolf is about five feet from the snout to the tip of the tail, which is about twenty inches long; height at shoulder about thirty-two inches; hair dark yellowish-gray, sometimes almost black, long and coarse in the northern varieties, and shorter in those which are found in warm climates; tail drooping; ears upright and pointed; eyes set obliquely. The wolf is swift, and preys on sheep and calves, associating in packs to run down deer and other animals; rarely attacking man unless hard pressed by hunger, when it becomes very dangerous. The geographical range is very wide, and it is common in Europe, though it has been extinct in England since the end of the fifteenth century. Of the other varieties the chief are the Black Wolf of Southern Europe; the Indian Wolf (C. pallipes); the White Wolf (C. laniger) and a variety with black shaggy fur (C. niger), from Tibet; the North American Wolf (C. occidentalis=Lupus griseus), differing chiefly from the Common Wolf in having finer, denser, and longer fur, and very broad feet, enabling it to travel easily over the snow; the White Wolf (Lupus albus), the Pied Wolf (L. stictic), the Dusky Wolf (L. nubilus); and the Black Wolf (L. ater), all from North America. [RED-WOLF.] The Prairie-wolf, or Coyote (Canis latrans), found from Mexico northward to the Saskatchewan, is probably a distinct species. It is much smaller than the Common Wolf, the body and head together measuring only about three feet, and the tail some fifteen inches; color dull yellowish-gray, clouded with black. They hunt in packs, and can utter a short, snapping bark, while the only sound made by the true wolves is a prolonged howl.

¶ 1. Dark as a wolf's mouth (or throat): Pitch-dark.

2. To cry wolf: To raise a false alarm. In allusion to the shepherd-boy in the fable, who used to cry "Wolf!" merely to make fun of the neighbors, but when at last the wolf came no one would believe him.

*3. To have a wolf by the ears: [See extract.]

"He that deals with men's affections hath a wolf by the ears; if we speak of peace, they wax wanton; if we reprove, they grow desperate."—Adams: Works, iii. 249.

*4. To have a wolf in the stomach: To be ravenously hungry.

5. To keep the wolf from the door: To keep out or off hunger or want.

6. To see a wolf: To lose one's voice. The ancients used to say that if a man saw a wolf before the wolf saw him he became dumb, at least for a time. (Virgil, Ecl. ix.)

wolf-berry, s.

Bot.: Symphoricarpos occidentalis. It is a shrub four to six feet high, with dense axillary spikes of drooping flowers; a native of Canada.

wolf-dog, s.

Zoölogy:

1. A variety of Canis familiaris, used for hunting; formerly abundant in Norway and Sweden, but is now almost entirely confined to Spain. It is of large size, little, if any, smaller than the mastiff (q. v.), nose pointed, ears erect, hair long and silky, usually white, with large patches of brown; tail curled over the back.

2. A dog bred from a wolf and a common dog. The offspring are fertile inter se. (Vero Shaw.)

wolf-fish, s. [SEA-WOLF.]

*wolf-month, s. The Saxon name for January, because "people are wont always in that month to be in more danger of being devoured by wolves than in any other." (Verstegan.)

wolf-net, s. A kind of net used in fishing, which takes great numbers.

wolf-note, s.

Music: A harsh sound occurring in string instruments owing to defective vibration on one or more notes of the scale.

"By a wrong adjustment of the sound-post or bass-bar what are called wolf-notes are produced, and when present they may generally be cured by the proper adjustment of the bar or post."—E. H. Allen: Violin Making, p. 149.

wolf-spider, s.

Zoöl. (pl.): The Lycosidæ (q. v.).

wolf's bane, s.

Botany:

1. One of the names of the genus Aconitum, spec. of A. napellus, A. lyctotomum, and A. lupulinum. (Paxton.)

2. Arnica montana. [ARNICA.]

3. Eranthis hyemalis. (Britten & Holland.)

fāte, fāt, fāre, amidst, whāt, fāll, father; wē, wēt, hēre, camel, hēr, thēre; pīne, pīt, sīre, sīr, marine; gō, pōt, or, wōre, wōlf, wōrk, whō, sōn; mūte, cūb, cūre, unite, cūr, rūle, fūll; trŷ, Sŷrian. æ, œ = ē; ey = ā. qu = kw.

wolf's claw, wolf's foot, s.

Bot.: Club-moss, Lycopodium clavatum, a cryptogamous plant of the genus Lycopodium. So named from the claw-like ends of the trailing stem. (Prior.) wolf's fist, s.

Bot.: Lycoperdon bovis.

wolf's foot, s. [WOLF'S CLAW.]

wolf's milk, s.

Bot.: The genus Euphorbia, spec. E. helioscopia. Probably named from the acrid qualities of the milk.

wolf's peach, s.

Bot.: The Tomato (q. v.).

wolf, v. t. & i. [WOLF, s.]

1. Trans.: To devour ravenously.

"Wolfing down some food preparatory to fishing."—Field, April 4, 1885.

2. Intrans.: To grumble or raise a howl (like a wolf) over any matter repugnant to one's feelings or contrary to his desires; as, He wolfed about his losses incessantly. (U. S. Colloq.)

wolf'-ach-ite, s. [After Wolfach, Baden, where found; suff. -ite (Min.).]

Mineral.: An orthorhombic mineral occurring in small crystals encrusting Nickeline (q. v.). Hardness, 5.5; specific gravity, 6.372; luster, metallic; color, silver to tin white; streak, black. An analysis yielded: Sulphur, 14.43; arsenic, 38.46; antimony, 13.17; lead, 1.32; silver, 0.12; iron, 3.71; nickel, 29.53 = 100.74, which is the same composition as the cubic Corynite (q. v.), so that the compound is dimorphous.

wolf'-i-a, s. [Named after S. F. Wolff, a writer on the botanical genus Lemna.]

Bot.: A genus of Pistiaceae, akin to Lemna. Frond oblong or subglobose, cleft near the base, rootless, spathe none, flowers bursting through the frond, anther one, sessile, one-celled, style short utriculate spherical, indehiscent, with one erect seed. Only known species, Wolffia arrhiza, found in ponds in England, parts of the European continent, and Western Africa.

Wolff'-i-an, Wolff'-i-an, a. & s. [For etym. see def. and compound.]

A. As adj.: Of, belonging to, proposed, or discovered by any person of the name of Wolff or Wolf, especially those mentioned in the compounds (q. v.).

B. As subst.: An adherent or defender of the Wolfian philosophy. [WOLFFIANISM.]

"The Wolfians had got hold of a sound principle only requiring limitation."—Wallace: Kant, p. 147.

Wolfian-bodies, s. pl.

Comp. Anat.: Two important organs in the vertebrate embryo, serving the purpose of temporary kidneys, from which the true kidneys are developed, except in the Fishes. They consist of a series of blind appendages, secreting a fluid which is conveyed by a duct on each side into the allantois. In man the Wolfian bodies make their appearance toward the first month of embryonic life, decreasing about the beginning of the third month, the true kidneys increasing in a corresponding ratio.

Wolfian-theory or hypothesis, s.

Historic criticism: A theory or hypothesis published by Friedrich August Wolf (1759-1824), the most distinguished German classical scholar of his time, in the Prolegomena to his second edition of Homer, sent forth in 1794 or 1795, to the effect that not merely were the Iliad and Odyssey composed by different poets, but that each of these compositions was put together from ballads preserved in the memory of itinerant minstrels or rhapsodists before writing was known in Greece, the poems taking their present form after writing was introduced in the sixth century B. C. Wolf's views attained to great celebrity, and an effort on the part of Heyne to claim priority in their discovery failed of effect. They not merely affected Homeric and other historic criticism permanently, but gave an impulse to the rationalistic treatment of Scripture which has not yet passed away. [CHORIZONTES.]

Wolff'-i-an-ism, Wolff'-i-an-ism, s. [English Wolfian (1), Wolfian; -ism.]

Philos.: The system developed from Leibnitzianism (q. v.), by Christian Wolff. [WOLFFIAN, A.] He appropriated the conceptions of Leibnitz, and modifying them to some extent, brought them into nearer agreement with the ordinary conceptions of things. He denied perceptions to all monads which were not souls [MONAD, 1], accepted the doctrine of preestablished harmony only as a permissible hypothesis, and refused to exclude the possibility of the interaction of soul and body. He divided metaphysics into ontology (treating of the existent in general), rational psychology (of the soul as a simple, non-extended substance), cosmology (dealing with the world as a whole), and rational theology (treating of the existence and attributes of God). His moral principle was the idea of perfection; and he taught that to labor for our own perfection and that of others is the law of our rational nature.

"The most influential opponent of Wolfianism . . . based ethics on the will of God as a lawgiver."—Ueberweg: Hist. Philos. (Eng. ed.), ii. 117.

wolf'-ish, a. [Eng. wolf; -ish.]

1. Like a wolf; having the qualities or form of a wolf.

"She'll flay thy wolfish visage."

Shakesp.: Lear, i. 4.

2. Ravenously hungry.

wolf'-ish-ly, adverb. [Eng. wolfish; -ly.] In a wolfish manner; like a wolf.

wolf'-kin, s. [Eng. wolf, s.; dimin. suff. -kin.] A young or small wolf.

"Kite and kestrel, wolf and wolfkin."

Tennyson: Boadicea, 15.

wolf'-ling, s. [Eng. wolf, s.; dimin. suff. -ling.] A young wolf.

"Wolfings . . . who would grow to be wolves."—Carlyle: Fr. Revol., pt. iii., bk. v., ch. iii.

wolf'-ram (1), wolf'-ram-ine (1), wolf'-ram-ite, s. [An ancient German miner's name, derived from the Lupi Spuma of Agricola (Foss. 255, 1546); suff. -ine, -ite (Min.); Fr. scheelin ferruginé.]

Min.: A mineral occurring mostly in tin-producing districts, sometimes in abundance, to the detriment of the tin ores. Crystallization, orthorhombic, but usually found lamellar, massive. Hardness, 5-5.5; specific gravity, 7.1-7.55; luster, submetallic; color and streak, reddish-brown to black, opaque. Composition: A tungstate of iron and manganese, the proportions of which are variable, and lead to differing formulæ, though most can be represented by $2\text{FeWO}_3 + 3\text{MnWO}_3$, or $4\text{FeWO}_3 + \text{MnWO}_3$.

wolf'-ram (2), s. [TUNGSTEN.]

wolfram-ocher, s. [TUNGSTITE.]

wolf'-ram-ine, s. [Eng. wolfram (2), suff. -ine.]

Min.: Tungstic ochre (q. v.).

wolfs'-bêrg-ite, subst. [After Wolfsberg, Hartz, where found; suff. -ite (Min.).]

Mineralogy:

1. The same as CHALCOSTIBITE (q. v.).

2. Capillary and massive forms of Jamesonite (q. v.).

wolf'-skin, s. & a. [Eng. wolf, s., and skin.]

A. As subst.: The skin or hide of a wolf.

B. As adj.: Made of the skin of a wolf.

"In wolfskin vest

Here roving wild." Wordsworth: Sonnets.

Wol'-las-tôn, s. [WOLLASTONITE.] (See etym. and compounds.)

Wollaston's battery, s.

Elect.: A galvanic battery so arranged that all the plates can be at once lifted from the liquid in the cells so as to stop the action of the battery.

Wollaston's doublet, s.

Optical Instrum.: Two plano-convex lenses used in place of one very convergent lens in a microscope. The plane face of each lens is turned to the object.

Wollaston's prism, s.

Optical Instrum.: A camera lucida, alone or fitted to a microscope.

wol'-as-tôn-ite, s. [After the English chemist, W. H. Wollaston (1766-1828), the discoverer of palladium and rhodium; suff. -ite (Min.).]

Mineralogy:

1. A mineral belonging to the group of bisilicates. Crystallization, monoclinic, though crystals are somewhat rare, the mineral occurring more frequently in masses with distinct cleavages. Hardness, 4.5-5; specific gravity, 2.78-2.9; luster, vitreous; color, white to gray. Composition: Silica, 51.7; lime, 48.3=100, which yields the formula, CaOSiO_2 . Good crystals are found in the old volcanic bombs of Monte Somma, Vesuvius, and occasionally in the granular limestone of Cziklowa, Hungary.

2. The same as PECTOLITE (q. v.).

woll'-ôn-gông'-ite, s. [After Wollongong, New South Wales, where it was stated to have been found; suff. -ite (Min.).]

Min.: A name given to a bituminous shale occurring in cubical blocks without lamination. Liver-side refers it to Torbanite (q. v.).

wol'-nÿn, s. [Etym. doubtful; prob. a Hungarian local name.]

Min.: A variety of Barite (q. v.) occurring in crystals lengthened in the direction of the vertical axis. First announced from Betler, Hungary.

wol'-vêr-êne, wol'-vêr-ine, s. [Formed from Eng. wolf (q. v.), from the exaggerated accounts of the ferocity of the animal.]

1. Zoölogy:

Gulo luscus.

[GLUTTON,

II. 1.]

"In those vast and still unmapped wildernesses may be found the gray fox, the musk-ox, the musquash, the ermine, and the wolverine, of whom Mr. A. Pen-darves Vivian, M. P., says that, although not bigger than a marten-cat, he is so ferocious as often to intimidate a bear. 'The wolverine goes,' says this experienced traveler, 'by many local names—such as "skunk-bear," "corky-joe," and "go-for-dog"—and is rapidly becoming scarce in the more frequented regions. Hunters relate wonderful stories of his ferocity.'"—London Daily Telegraph.

2. A nickname for an inhabitant of the state of Michigan.

wolves, s. pl. [WOLF.]

*wolves' thistle, s.

Bot.: Carlina acaulis. (Britten & Holland.)

wolv'-ish, a. [Eng. wolv(es); -ish.] Resembling a wolf; wolfish.

wol'-ÿn-ite, subst. [After Volhynia, or Wolhynia, where found; suff. -ite (Petrol.).]

Petrol.: A name given to a rock consisting of a spherulitic oligoclase and acicular hornblende; enclosing, as accessory minerals, magnetite and pyrites.

wom'-an, *wim-man, *wim-mon, *wum-man, *wom-man (pl. women, *wemen, *wymmen), subst. [A. S. wifman=a wife-man (pl. wifmen, wimmen). By assimilation wifman became wimman in the tenth century. Cf. lammas=A. S. hlafmæsse; leman=A. S. leofman, &c. The change of vowel was due to the preceding w, as in A. S. widu, later wudu=a wood.]

1. The female of the human race; an adult or grown up female, as distinguished from a girl.

"The rib, which the Lord God had taken from the man, made he a woman."—Genesis ii. 22.

*2. A wife. (Shakesp.: Henry IV., Pt. I., ii. 3.)

"There was a commotion among the delegates to the late woman suffragists' convention."—Chicago Daily News, Feb. 23, 1894.

woman-tired, a. Henpecked.

"Dotard, thou art woman-tired."

Shakesp.: Winter's Tale, ii. 3.

woman-vested, adj. Clothed like a woman; wearing women's clothes. (Tennyson: Princess, i. 163.)

woman-warrior, s. A female warrior.

"Thou woman-warrior with the curling hair."

Pope: Homer's Iliad, xi. 492.

woman-worship, s. Excessive reverence paid to women. It is closely connected with the worship of female divinities, which probably is a development from Nature-worship, in which the Earth was personified as a fruitful mother. Great reverence for women has always been a characteristic of the Teutonic nations, and was peculiarly prevalent in the ages of chivalry. Grimm (Deut. Myth., Eng. ed. i. 398) gives some remarkable formulæ of chivalry ("by all women's honor," "for the sake of all women," &c.) in which this reverence is clearly shown.

"He thus becomes the type of the husbands of the Middle-Age, and of the woman-worship of chivalry. Woman-worship, 'the honor due to the weaker vessel' is indeed of God, and woe to the nation and to the man in whom it dies."—C. Kingsley: Saint's Tragedy. (Intro.)

wom'-an, v. t. [WOMAN, s.]

1. To act the part of a woman. (With an indefinite it.)

"My daughter Silvia, how she would Have womaned it."

Daniel.

2. To cause to act like a woman; to subdue to weakness like a woman.

Zoöl.: Phascolomys wombat, a burrowing marsupial from Australia and Van Dieman's Land, and the islands of Bass' Strait. It is from two to three feet long, with a short tail; of clumsy form, with stout limbs and a blunt muzzle; coat thick, of long, coarse, brownish-gray, woolly hair; head large, flat, broad, with small eyes and ears; fore feet with five and hind feet with four digits; soles broad and naked. The dentition resembles that of the Rodentia, especially in the chisel-like incisors. The Wombat is nocturnal in habit, a vegetable feeder, digging up roots with its claws. It is of small intelligence, but is gentle, and capable of domestication to a limited extent. It is hunted for its flesh, which is highly esteemed, and is said to resemble pork.

wōmb-ȳ, (b silent), a. [Eng. womb, s.; -y.] Hollow, capacious.

"That caves and womby vaultages of France."

Shakesp.: Henry V., ii. 4.

women (as wīm'-mīn), s. pl. [WOMAN.]

women's rights, s. pl. The name given to the claims advanced on behalf of women who demand that their sex shall, as far as possible, be put on a footing of legal and social equality with men. The agitation for women's rights dates from 1851, and was the result of an article on the subject in the Westminster Review of that year by John Stuart Mill. Women claim the right to vote at all political elections on the ground that, when householders, they pay rates and taxes, and therefore ought not to be denied a voice in deciding how local and imperial revenues should be spent. They also desire to share with men all the educational endowments of the country—to enter suitable trades and professions on the same terms as men—to change the laws of marriage and divorce, in the making of which they have no voice, and which, they contend, press with unequal severity upon them. In several of the States of the Union women vote, and in one at least they are on the same footing as men politically. In England women possess the municipal but not the parliamentary franchise, and there is a general tendency in America and Europe to admit women to some, if not all, of the benefits of University education, and to the practice of medicine. [WOMAN SUFFRAGE.]

womenkind (as wīm'-mīn-kind), subst. [Eng. women, and kind, s.] The same as WOMANKIND, 2. (q. v.) wōn'-dēr-ēr, s. [Eng. wonder, v.; -er.] One who wonders.

wōn'-dēr-flōw-ēr, s. [Ger. wunderblume.]

Anthrop.: A popular name in Teutonic folk-tales for a flower endowed with miraculous power, especially with regard to the discovery of buried treasure. Grimm thinks that the name Forget-me-not applied to the Germander Speedwell and Myosotis has reference to this supposed miraculous power, and that the "sentimental" explanation came later. (See extract.)

"The folk-tales simply call it a beautiful wonderflower, which the favored person finds and sticks in his hat: all at once entrance and exit stand open for him to the treasure of the mountain. If inside the cavern he has filled his pockets, and, bewildered at the sight of the valuables, had laid aside his hat, a warning voice rings in his ear as he departs, Forget not the best! . . . In a twinkling all has disappeared, and the road is never to be found again."—Grimm: Deut. Mythol. (Eng. ed.), iii. 971, 972.

I. Ordinary Language:

1. Literally:

(1) A large and thick collection of growing trees; a forest.

"From Badby I rode through some woods."—Pennant: Journey from Chester, p. 394.

(2) The substance of trees. [II. 1.]

(3) Timber; the trunks or main stems of trees which attain such dimensions as to be fit for architectural and other purposes. (In this sense the word denotes not only standing trees suitable for buildings, &c., but also such trees cut into beams, rafters, planks, &c. [TIMBER.]

*2. Fig.: A crowded mass or collection of anything; a forest. (The Lat. sylva=a wood, is used in the same manner.)

'A blaze of bucklers and a wood of spears.'

Pope: Homer's Odyssey, xxii. 161.

II. Technically:

1. Art: [WOOD-ENGRAVING.]

2. Bot., Veget. Physiol., &c.: Botanists use the term wood in two senses: first, the portion of the stem and branches which intervenes between the pith and the bark, without reference to whether it is hard or soft; and second, the hard portion of the stem and branches of a tree or shrub, the soft substance existing in similar situations in an herb being denied the name of wood. No wood exists in the embryo of an exogen, which at the outset consists wholly of cellular tissue. Soon after it has germinated, however, fine ligneous fibers descend from the cotyledons to the radicle, meeting in the center of the embryo, and constituting a fine ligneous axis. Somewhat similarly, each leaf, after the tree or shrub has grown, sends down elaborated sap, which forms a layer, sheath, or ring of cambium inside the bark. [CAMBIUM.] The cambium layer generates fibro-vascular bundles, the inner portion being woody [XYLEM] and the outer portion less solid. [BAST, PHLOEM.] At first the bundles are separate from each other, but ultimately they unite and constitute a hollow cylinder around the central pith. This process continuing, especially in spring, new wood is added around the old, and being softer than that previously existing, is called alburnum or sap-wood, the other being denominated duramen, or heart-wood (q. v.). The intermission of growth in winter leaves a circular mark on the stem, well seen in a cross section, thus giving rise to a series of annual zones. [ZONE.] Exogenous wood is traversed by medullary rays (q. v.). In woody endogens, such as palms, there is no proper cambium layer, nor is there a central pith, but the fibro-vascular bundles are separated from each other, and may be seen on a cross section scattered irregularly over the whole breadth of the stem, but more numerous, closer together, and harder near the circumference than toward the center. In the stems of the woody acrogens (Tree-ferns) there is a circle of fibro-vascular bundles not far from the exterior of the stem. The cross-section shows these to be, as a rule, united in pairs. [FOS-SIL-WOOD, SILICIFIED-WOOD.]

3. Her.: The same as HURST (q. v.).

4. Music (pl.): That class of wind-instruments constructed of wood, ivory, or the like, the principal of which are the flutes, oboes, clarinets, bassoons, &c., in contradistinction to the strings and brass.

¶ (1) Drawn from the wood: Drawn from the cask. Applied to wines and beers which are supplied to the consumer direct from the cask.

(2) Wine in the wood: Wine in cask, as distinguished from wine bottled or decanted.

(3) To have the dead wood on one: To have an indisputable advantage of a person.

wood-acid, s. [WOOD-VINEGAR.]

wood-almond, s.

Bot.: Hippocratea comosa. [HIPPOCRATEA.]

wood-anemone, s.

Bot.: Anemone nemorosa. Rootstock horizontal, woody; leaves trifoliate, with the leaflets few, lanceolate, lobed, and cut, remote from the flower; involucre similar to their petiolate, stem with a single flower on a scape, sepals six, rarely five to nine, resembling petals, sometimes tinged on the outside with purple; point of achene not feathery.

wood-ant, s.

Entom.: Formica rufa, an exceedingly common species. Head and thorax rusty red, with a blackish-brown tinge in parts, legs and abdomen of the latter hue; the largest workers are about a quarter of an inch long. Found in woods, where it heaps up a great mass of vegetable fragments, beneath which the nest is continued in a great extent of subterranean passages and chambers. The wood-ant possesses no sting, but has the power of ejecting its acid secretion to keep enemies at a distance.

wood-apple, s.

Bot.: Feronia elephantum. [FERONIA, 3.]

wood-ashes, s. pl. The remains of burned wood or plants.

wood-avens, s.

Botany: Geum intermedium, a hybrid between G. urbanum and G. rivale, not uncommon in damp woods.

wood-baboon, s.

Zoöl.: Cynocephalus leucophæus, allied to, but smaller than the Mandrill (q. v.). It is a native of the coast of Guinea; fur greenish, whitish beneath; callosities scarlet. Called also Cinereous Baboon, Drill, and Yellow Baboon.

wood-bird, s. A bird which lives in the woods.

"The wood-birds ceased from singing."

Longfellow: Hiawatha, vi.

wood-blade, s.

Bot.: Luzula sylvatica.

wood-boring, adj. Capable of boring through wood.

Wood-boring shrimp.

Zoöl.: Chelura terebrans.

*wood-born, *wood-borne, adject. Born in the woods.

"The wood-borne people fall before her fiat."

Spenser: F. Q., I. vi. 16.

wood-bound, a. Encumbered with tall, woody hedgerows.

wood-brick, s. [WOODEN-BRICK.]

wood-butterfly, s.

Entom.: The genus Lasiommata (q. v.).

wood-carpet, s.

1. Ord. Lang.: A floor-covering made of slats, or more ornamental shapes, glued or cemented upon a cloth backing.

2. Entom.: A Geometer Moth, Melanippe rivata. Fore wings gray, with a broad dark gray central band. The caterpillar feeds on Galium mollugo.

wood-carving, s.

1. The art or process of carving wood into ornamental figures or of decorating wood by carving on it.

2. A device or figure carved on or out of wood.

wood-cell, wood-fiber, s.

Bot.: A cell or fiber of the type Prosenchyma (q. v.). Such cells are always fusiform, thickened, lignified, unbranched, and, as a rule, furnished with very small, bordered pits. Called also Libriform-cells. (Thomé.)

wood-charcoal, s. [CHARCOAL.]

*wood-choir, subst. A chorus of birds in a wood. (Coleridge.)

wood-copper, s. [OLIVENITE.]

wood-corn, s. A certain quantity of grain paid by the tenants of some manors to the lord, for the liberty of picking up dried or broken wood.

*wood-cracker, s.

Ornith.: (See extract.)

"He (Plot) writes (Nat. Hist. Oxfordsh., p. 175) of a bird 'sometimes seen, but oftener heard in the Park at Woodstock, from the noise that it makes commonly called the Wood-cracker;' described to me (for I had not the happiness to see it) to be about the bigness of a sparrow, with a blue back and a reddish breast, a wide mouth, and a long bill, which it puts into a crack or splinter of a rotten bough of a tree, and makes a noise as if it were rending asunder, with that violence, that the noise may be heard at least twelve score yards, some have ventured to say a mile, from the place.' It will be seen that the bird described was a Nuthatch, but the noise was no doubt made by a wood-pecker."—Yarrell: Brit. Birds (ed. 4th). ii. 447. (Note f.)

wood-craft, s. [WOODCRAFT.]

wood-cricket, s. [NEMOBIUS.]

wood-crowfoot, s.

Bot.: Anemone nemorosa. (Prior.)

wood-crowned, a. Crowned or surmounted by woods.

"The wood-crown'd cliffs that o'er the lake recline."

Wordsworth: Descriptive Sketches.

wood-culver, s. The wood-pigeon. (Prov.)

wood-cut, s. An engraving on wood, or a print; or impression from such engraving.

wood-cutter, s.

1. One who cuts wood or timber.

2. One who makes wood-cuts; an engraver on wood.

wood-cutting, s.

1. The act or employment of cutting wood or timber by means of saws or by the application of knife-edge machinery.

2. Wood-engraving (q. v.).

"It is vexatious to see much good wood-cutting bestowed on such poor and inexpressive drawings."—Pall Mall Gazette.

wood-demon, s.

Anthrop.: A demon supposed to inhabit woods and to prey on travelers. [FOREST-SPIRITS.]

"The terrific cry of the wood-demon is heard in the Finland forest."—Tylor: Prim. Cult. (ed. 1873), ii. 222.

wood-dove, s. The wood-pigeon (q. v.).

wood-drink, s. A decoction or infusion of medicinal woods, as sassafras.

"The drinking elder-wine or wood-drinks are very useful."—Floyer: On the Humors.

wood-duck, s. [SUMMER-DUCK.]

wood-engraver, s. An artist who engraves on wood.

wood-engraving, s. The art of engraving upon wood blocks for printing purposes. It is mainly employed in pictorial illustration, and has the advantage over engravings on copper and steel that the illustrations and letter-press can be set up and printed together. The blocks on which the engravings are made are prepared from boxwood for all fine work, and from pear or other close-grained wood for larger work. A very fine surface is given to the block upon which the subject to be engraved is drawn or photographed. The work is executed by gravers of various shapes, the principle of the art being that the lines intended to appear when printed are left standing, all the white parts being cut away. In steel and copper-plate engraving the principle is reversed, the lines intended to appear being cut into the plate.

wood-everlasting-pea, s.

Bot.: Lathyrus sylvestris. Called also the Narrow-leaved Everlasting Pea. It has large, greenish flowers, with purple veins.

wood-fiend, s.

Anthrop.: A wood-demon (q. v.).

"The groups of malicious wood-fiends so obviously devised to account for the mysterious influences that beset the forest wanderer."—Tylor: Prim. Cult. (ed. 1873), ii. 222.

wood-fretter, s. An insect or worm that eats into wood.

wood-gas, s. Carburetted hydrogen obtained from wood.

wood-gear, s. Cog-wheels of wood; used sometimes in roughly-made cider mills and presses, &c., and formerly in clocks. Apple, pear, dog, and box-wood are good timber for the purpose.

*wood-geld, s.

Law: The money paid for the cutting of wood within a forest.

wood-germander, s. The same as WOOD-SAGE (q. v.).

wood-gnat, s.

Entom.: Culex nemorosus, a European species. It frequents woods, but does not enter houses.

*wood-god, s. A sylvan deity.

"Wood-gods, and satyres, and swift dryades."

Spenser: Virgil; Gnat.

wood-grass, s.

Bot.: (1) Sorghum, or Andropogon nutans; (2) Luzula sylvatica.

wood-grinder, subst. A machine for rasping wooden blocks, to make paper-pulp. [WOOD-PAPER.]

fâte, fât, färe, amidst, whât, fáll, father; wē, wēt, hère, camēl, hēr, thêre; pīne, pīt, sīre, sīr, marīne; gō, pōt, or. wōre, wōlf, wōrk, whō, sōn: mūte, cūb. cūre, unite, cūr, rāle, fūll; trȳ, Sȳrian. æ, œ = ē; ey = ā. qu = kw.

wood-grouse, s. The Capercaillie (q. v.).
wood-hanging, s. Thin veneer on a paper backing, to be used as wall-paper.

wood-hen, s.

Ornith.: The genus Ocydromus (q. v.).

wood-hole, s. A place where wood is stored or laid up.

"Confounded, to the dark recess I fly Of wood-hole." Philips. (Todd.)

wood-hoopoes, s. pl.

Ornith.: The genus Irrisor, sometimes placed with the Upupidae, but by some authorities raised to the rank of a family, Irrisoridae. There are twelve species, strictly confined to Africa, ranging from Abyssinia to the west coast, and south to Cape Colony. Bill curved; tail very long and strongly graduated; dark, metallic plumage, inclining more or less to black. They form a connecting link between the true Hoopoes and the Hornbills.

wood-house, s.

1. A house or shed in which wood is deposited and sheltered from the weather.
 2. A house constructed of wood.

wood humble-bee, s.

Entom.: Bombus lucorum.

wood-ibises, s. pl.

Ornith.: The genus Tantalus (q. v.).

wood-iron, s.

Min.: A variety of limonite (q. v.) having a structure resembling that of wood.

wood-laurel, s.

Bot.: Daphne laureola. (Prior.) wood-layer, s.

Bot.: A young oak or other timber plant laid down among the hawthorn, whitethorn, or other smaller trees planted to make hedges.

wood-leaf, s. A leaf gathered in the woods. (Shakesp.: Cymbeline, iv. 2.)

wood-leopard moth, s.

Entomology: A European Moth, Zeuzera cesculi. Wings white, half-transparent, with bluish-black spots, the fore ones the brighter. Thorax white, with three bluish-black spots on each side; abdomen bluish-black, with white scales. Expansion of wings, in the male two inches, in the female two and a half. Caterpillar yellow, with shining black spots; it feeds on the elm, the horse-chestnut, the pear, the apple, &c.

wood-lily, s.

Bot.: Convallaria majalis, the Sweet-scented Lily of the Valley. (Prior.) [CONVALLARIA.]

wood-lock, s.

Naut.: A block in the scores of the stern-post to keep the rudder from lifting off its bearings.

wood-louse, s.

Zoöl.: Any species or individual of the family Oniscidae (q. v.). [ARMADILLO, 2.]

wood-meil, s. Wadmall (q. v.).

wood-mite, s.

Zoöl. (pl.): The family Oribatidae.

wood-monger, s. A wood-seller; a dealer in wood.

"One Smith, a wood-monger of Westminster."—Wotton: Remains, p. 547.

wood-moss, s. Moss growing on wood.

wood-mote, s. The ancient name of the forest court, now the Court of Attachment, otherwise called the Forty-Days Court.

wood-mouse, s.

Zoölogy: Mus sylvaticus, the Long-tailed Field Mouse, common over the temperate parts of Europe and Asia. It is a little larger than the Common Mouse, with a proportionately longer tail; yellowish-brown on upper surface, whitish beneath.

wood-naphtha, s.

Chem.: The neutral crude distillate obtained from the products of the destructive distillation of wood. It contains from 75 to 85 per cent. of pure wood spirit, or methylic alcohol, 5 to 10 per cent. of acetone, with much smaller proportions of creosote, aldehyde, hydrocarbon oils, and other substances that are but little known. In its most rectified condition it possesses a specific gravity of .830.

wood-nightshade, s. [WOODY-NIGHTSHADE.]

wood-note, s. A wild or natural note, like that of a forest bird, as the wood-lark, thrush, or nightingale.

"Sweetest Shakespeare, Fancy's child, Warble his native wood-notes wild."
Milton: L'Allegro, 134.

wood-nut, s.

Bot.: Corylus avellana. [HAZEL.]

wood-nymph, s.

1. Ord. Lang.: A dryad (q. v.).

"The wood-nymphs decked with daisies trim."
Milton: Comus, 120.

2. Ornith. (pl.): The genus Thalurania (q. v.).

wood-offering, s. Wood burnt on the altar.

"We cast the lots for the wood-offering."—Neh. x. 34.

wood-oil, s. An oil produced by several Burmese trees, spec. by Dipterocarpus laevis and D. turbinatus. [DIPTEROCARPUS-BALSAM.] wood-opal, s.

Min.: An opal form of silica which has gradually replaced the organic structures of trees; a pseudomorph of a mineral after a vegetable structure.

wood-owl, s.

Ornith.: Any individual of the genus Syrnium (q. v.).

wood-paper, s. Paper made of wood reduced to a pulp by mechanical or chemical means; more usually by a combination of the two.

wood-pavement, subst. Pavement composed of blocks of wood, generally cedar, frequently called block-pavement. Common in American cities.

wood-pea, s.

Bot.: Orobis tuberosus=Lathyrus macrorrhizus.

wood-pie, s. A name given to the great spotted woodpecker, Picus major.

wood-pigeon, s. [WOODPIGEON.] wood-pile, s. A stack of wood piled up for fuel.

wood-rat, s.

Zoöl.: The genus Neotoma (q. v.). Neotoma floridana, the Common Wood-rat, is called also the Florida Rat. N. cinerea is the Bushy-tailed Wood-rat.

wood-reed, wood small-reed, s.

Bot.: Calamagrostis epigeios. It is two to six feet high, with very long, flat, scabrid leaves, glaucous beneath, and panicles of purplish-brown flowers. [CALAMAGROSTIS.] So named to distinguish it from the Pool-reed, Phragmites communis.

wood-roof, wood-ruff, s. [WOODRUFF.] wood-rush, s.

Bot.: The genus Luzula (q. v.).

wood-sage, s.

Bot.: Teucrium scorodonia. It is one to two feet high, with oblong ovate, very much wrinkled leaves, green on both sides, and downy; inflorescence in one-sided lateral or terminal racemes of yellowish-white flowers. It is extremely bitter, and has been used as a substitute for hops. It is common in Great Britain in woods and dry stony places, and is found also on the European continent and in North Africa.

wood-sale, s. The act of selling wood.

Wood-sale time: The time for selling wood.

"A sort of lusty bib-men sat
In wood-sale time to sell a cops by great."
Sylvester: The Captaines, p. 243.

wood-sandpiper, s.

Ornith.: Totanus glareola, about ten inches long; general plumage shades of brown above, spotted and barred with white; under surface grayish-white to white.

wood-sare, s. Cuckoo-spit (q. v.).

"The froth called wood-sare, being like a kind of spittle, is found upon herbs, as lavender and sage."—Bacon.

wood-screw, subst. A metallic screw for carpenters' and joiners' use in securing pieces of work together.

wood-sere, s. & a.

A. As subst.: The time when there is no sap in the tree.

"From May to October leave cropping, for why,
In wood-sere, whatever thou cropest shall die."
Tusser: Five Hundred Points of Good Husbandry.

B. As adj.: Spongy, loose.

"The soil . . . is a poor wood-sere land very natural for the production of oaks especially."—Aubrey: Miscell., p. 211.

wood-shock, s.

Zoöl.: [PEKAN, 2.]

wood-shrikes, s. pl. [PRIONOPIDÆ.] wood-skin, s. A large canoe used by the Indians of Guiana, made from the bark of the purple-heart tree and the simari or locust tree. Some of these canoes are so large as to carry twenty to twenty-five persons. (Simmonds.) wood-soot, s. Soot from burnt wood. It is useful as a manure.

wood-sorrel, *wood-sore, *wood-sour, *wood-sower, s.

Botany: The genus Oxalis, spec. O. acetosella. [OXALIS.]

wood-speck, s.

Ornith.: A local name for a Woodpecker (q. v.).

"Of picus martius the wood-speck, many kinds."—Browne: Norfolk Birds.

wood-spirit, s. [METHYLIC-ALCOHOL.]

wood-spice, s.

Ornith.: A local name for a Woodpecker (q. v.).

"The tail consists of ten feathers only, as in Wood-spices."—Willughby: Ornithology (ed. Ray), p. 145.

wood-spurge, s.

Bot.: Euphorbia characias, the Upright Red-spurge.

wood-stamp, s. An engraved or carved stamp formed of a block of wood, to impress figures or colors on fabrics.

wood-star, s.

Ornith.: A popular name for any Humming-bird of the genera Chætocercus, Doricha, or Myrtis.

wood-stone, s.

Min.: A chert (q. v.) which has replaced wood.

wood-stops, s. pl.

Music: Organ stops, the pipes of which are of wood.

wood-strawberry, s.

Bot.: Fragaria vesca. Called also Wild-strawberry. [FRAGARIA, STRAWBERRY.]

wood-swallow, s.

Ornith.: The same as SWALLOW-SHRIKE (q. v.). The Common Wood-swallow is Artamus sordidus.

wood-swift, s.

Entom.: A European Moth, Hepialus sylvinus. Fore wings dull orange, with indistinct darker markings and an oblique white streak. Called also the Evening Swift. [SWIFT, C. II. 2.] wood-tar, s. Tar obtained from wood.

wood-tiger, wood-tiger moth, s.

Entom.: A Tiger Moth, Nemcophila plantaginis. [NEMEOPHILA.]

wood-tin, s.

Min.: A variety of Cassiterite (q. v.), with concentric and fibrous structure.

wood-vetch, s.

Bot.: Vicia sylvatica; a species with branched tendrils and white flowers with blue veins. Found in Great Britain in rocky woods, but is rare.

wood-vine, s.

Bot.: Bryonia dioica.

wood-vinegar, s. [VINEGAR.]

wood-walker, s.

Zoöl.: A popular name for the genus Hylobates, of which it is a literal translation. [GIBBON, HYLOBATES.]

"A genus of Apes, sometimes called Wood-walkers from their astonishing agility in swinging from tree to tree."—Ripley & Dana: Amer. Cyclop., vii. 796.

wood-warbler, s.

Ornithology:

†1. The Wood-wren (q. v.).

2. (Pl.): [MNIOTILIDÆ.]

wood-ward, s. A woodreeve, a forester.

"He used to ride to the woods, and visit all the coppices, and ask the wood-ward several questions."—Dr. Pope: Life of Bishop Ward, p. 75.

wood-wasp, s.

Entom.: Vespa sylvestris. It builds an oval nest, which it suspends from the branch of a tree.

wood-witch, s.

Bot.: Phallus impudicus. [PHALLUS, 2.]

wood-work, s. Work formed of wood; that part of any structure which is composed of wood.

wood-worm, s. A worm that is bred in wood.

wood-wren, s.

Ornith.: Phylloscopus sibilatrix (†Sylvia sylvicola), a species often confounded with the Willow-wren (q. v.), from which, however, it may be distinguished by its larger wings, a broad streak of sulphur-yellow over the eye and ear-coverts, and its plumage, which is green above and white below. It differs, also, from most of the Warblers in eating neither fruit nor berries, but subsisting on insects or their larvæ. The nest is oval, domed, and placed on the ground; eggs six, transparent, white, thickly spotted with dark purplish-brown.

wood (2), s. [WOAD.]

boil, boy; pout, jowl; cat, cell, chorus, chin, bench; go, gem; thin, this; sin, as; expect, Xenophon, exist. ph = f.

wood-waxen, s. [WOAD-WAXEN.]

wood (1), v. t. & i. [WOOD (1), s.]

A. Transitive:

1. To supply with wood; to get in supplies of wood for.

"Our next employment was wooding and watering our squadron."—Anson: Voyages, bk. i., ch. v.

*2. To hide or place in a wood.

"We landed, and faire and easily followed for a small time after them, who had wooded themselves we know not where."—Hackluyt: Voyages, iii. 259.

B. Intrans.: To take in or get supplies of wood.

"Continued their wooding and watering till the 8th."—Anson: Voyages, bk. iii., ch. x.

wood (2), wode, v. i. [WOOD, a.] To be or act as one mad; to rave.

"He stareth and wodeth in his aduertence."

Chaucer: C. T., 15, 936.

wood'-bine, wood'-bynd, wod-bynde, subst. [A. S. wudebinde=ivy, because it binds or winds round trees.]

Botany:

1. The Honeysuckle (q. v.).

2. Polygonum convolvulus. It is one to four feet long, has an angular twining stem, and cordate sagittate leaves. Found in fields and waste places.

wood'-būr-ŷ-type, s. [Named from the inventor of the process, Mr. Woodbury, a London photographer.]

Photography: A method of obtaining permanent impressions from a photograph. A film of bichromatized gelatine on a sheet of glass is exposed under a photographic negative, and the portion unacted upon by the light washed away with water, leaving the printed parts in relief. After drying it is laid on a perfectly flat metallic plate, and a sheet of lead pressed down upon it by a powerful press, an exact mold being thus obtained. A viscous solution of gelatine mixed with a small proportion of a pigment or dye is next poured over the mold, and a sheet of strongly sized paper placed on top and firmly squeezed. On carefully removing the paper a perfect impression is obtained, and this is fixed by immersing in a strong solution of alum. Any number of copies may be obtained from the same mold.

wood'-ghāt, s. [Eng. wood (1), s., and chat.]

Ornith.: Lanius auriculatus, an African Shrike, ranging from the Mediterranean to the Cape of Good Hope, and visiting Europe in the summer. The popular name is misleading, as the bird has no affinity with the Chats, and to avoid confusion some authors call it the Woodchat-shrike. Length rather more than seven inches; upper parts mostly black, crown of head and nape chestnut-red, outer tail feathers, spots on wings, streak above the base of bill on each side, and under surface white.

woodchat-shrike, s. [WOODCHAT.]

wood'-chūck, s. [Eng. wood; second element doubtful.]

Zoölogy: Arctomys monax, a small American burrowing rodent, ranging from the Carolinas to Hudson's Bay, and westward from the Atlantic coast to Missouri, Iowa, and Minnesota. Length from fifteen to eighteen inches; blackish or grizzled on upper surface, chestnut-red below; body stout, head broad and flat, legs short and thick. The Woodchuck is a vegetable feeder, and may be easily tamed. Called also the Ground-hog.

Woodchuck.

wood'-cōal, subst. [Eng. wood (1) s., and coal.] Charcoal; also lignite or brown-coal.

wood'-cōck, s. [A. S. wuducoc.]

1. Ornith.: Sceloporus rusticola (the rusticola of Linnaeus) is a scorpion; cf. Pliny: N. H., x. 54, in some editions 38; distributed over Europe, the north of Asia, and as far East as Japan, visiting Europe in October and departing in March, though some remain to breed, and the number is yearly increasing. The woodcock is about thirteen inches long; upper surface varied with ruddy, yellowish, and ash tints, and marked with great black spots; lower parts yellowish-red with brown zigzags; quills striped with red and black on their external barbs, tail-feathers terminated above with gray and below with white. The female is rather larger and stouter than the male. One of the most interesting traits about the Woodcock is the fact of its occasionally conveying its young through the air; which is done by only one or two other birds. The fact was known in the middle of the eighteenth century; but White (lett. xxxi., to Pennant) rightly surmised that Scopoli erred in supposing that the young one was conveyed either by or in the bill. It is just as erroneous, however, to substitute the claws, as some have done, for the bill. When the parent bird wishes to convey her young one from a place of danger to one of safety, the tiny thing is gently pressed between the feet and against the breast, the aid of the bill only being resorted to when the burden has been hastily taken up. The American Woodcock, Philohela minor, is a smaller bird, but resembles the European species in plumage and habit, and, like it, is esteemed for the table.

2. Zoöl.: A collector's name for some species of the genus Murex (q. v.), from the resemblance of the spines or the elongated tube to the bill of the Woodcock. Murex tenuispina is the Thorny Woodcock, and M. haustellum the Woodcock's (or Snipe's) Head.

3. Fig.: A simpleton; in allusion to the ease with which a woodcock allows itself to be taken in springes or nets set in the glades.

"But if I knew when you come next a burding, I'll have a stronger noose to hold the woodcock."

Beaum. & Flet.: Scornful Lady, iv.

¶ Springes to catch woodcocks: Arts to entrap simplicity. (Shakesp.: Hamlet, i. 3.)

woodcock-eye, s. A name for a snaphook.

woodcock-fish, s.

Ichthyol.: Centriscus scolopax, the Trumpet-fish. Sir Thomas Browne (of Fishes, &c.) calls it a Sea-woodcock.

woodcock-owl, s.

Ornithol.: Asio accipitrinus (†Otus brachyotus), the Short-eared Owl.

"A large proportion of the examples seen in this country are winter visitors that come from the north of Europe in October, and have in consequence been called Woodcock-owls."—Yarrell: Brit. Birds (ed. 4th), i. 163.

woodcock-pilot, s.

Ornithol.: Regulus cristatus. [GOLDEN-CRESTED WREN.]

"The migrating bodies are usually preceded by flocks of tiny goldcrests; and so invariable is this rule that the latter have come to be called 'woodcock-pilots.'"—St. James's Gazette, Mar. 14, 1887.

woodcock-shell, s. [WOODCOCK, 2.]

woodcock's head, s. A tobacco pipe, from the fact that the early English pipes were often made in that form.

"I have not the breath of a woodcock's head."—Ben Jonson: Every Man out of His Humor, iii. 3.

wood'-craft, s. [Eng. wood (1), s., and craft.]

1. Arboriculture; scientific forestry.

"I know this may have been done in Germany, where woodcraft is a science; but I have never heard of its having been even suggested in England."—St. James's Gazette, May 25, 1886.

2. Skill in anything which pertains to the woods or forest; skill in the chase, especially in hunting deer, finding a track through a forest, &c.

"I do not know what we should have done without the handy Indian woodcraft of the guides, which now came greatly to the rescue."—Scribner's Magazine, Aug., 1877, p. 500.

wood'-ēd, a. [Eng. wood (1), s.; -ed.]

1. Lit.: Supplied or covered with wood.

"Remote among the wooded hills," Longfellow: Tales of a Wayside Inn. (Prel.)

*2. Fig.: Crowded; thick as trees in a wood.

"The hills are wooded with their partisans."

Beaum. & Flet.: Bonduca, i. 2.

wood'-en (1), wod-den, a. [Eng. wood (1), s.; -en.]

1. Lit.: Made of wood; consisting or composed of wood.

"They wear their hair tied on the top like a wreath of hay, and put a wooden pinne within it, or any other such thing instead of a nail."—Hackluyt: Voyages, p. 203.

2. Figuratively:

(1) Stiff, ungainly, clumsy, awkward.

"When a bold man is out of countenance, he makes a very wooden figure on it."—Collier: On Confidence.

(2) Spiritless, expressionless. (See extract under WOODENNESS.)

wooden-brick, wood-brick, s. A brick-shaped block built into a wall to afford nail-hold in securing the inside wood-work.

wooden-clock, s. A clock in which the case, a large part of the machinery, &c., are made of wood.

wooden-headed, a. Stupid, dense, thick-headed; dull of apprehension.

1. A ship.

"Milford Haven, the chief stable for his wooden horses."—Fuller: Worthies, ch. vi.

2. An erection made of planks nailed together so as to form a sharp ridge, on which soldiers were set astride as a punishment, with muskets tied to their legs. The practice has long been discontinued.

3. A child's toy.

wooden-leg, s. An artificial leg made of wood.

wooden-pavement, s. [WOOD-PAVEMENT.]

wooden-screw, s. A screw of wood, such as is used in the clamping-jaw of a carpenter's bench.

2. Fig.: [SPOON, s., ¶ (4).]

wooden-shoes, s. pl. An old nickname for Frenchmen, in reference to the sabots worn by them.

"Round-heads and wooden-shoes are standing jokes."
Addison: Drummer. (Prol.)

wooden-type, s. Large type, cut in wood, for posters, &c.

wooden-wall, s. The side of a ship; hence, a ship itself.

¶ When Athens was in imminent danger from the Persians, B. C. 483, during the invasion of Xerxes, the oracle at Delphi was consulted, and, intimating that the city and country were doomed to ruin, added that—when all was lost, a wooden wall should still shelter her citizens. The Athenian young men interpreted "a wooden wall" to signify ships; Themistocles, who had probably influenced the oracle to utter the prediction or counsel it had given, was of the same opinion; faith was put in the navy, and the result was the great victory of Salamis. It was from this incident that the expression, "The wooden walls of England," arose.

wooden-ware, s. A specific term for vessels, such as bowls, platters, spoons, butter-prints, &c., turned from wood; wooden articles of merchandise.

wooden-wedge, s. [WEDGE (2), s.] wooden-wing, s.

Naut.: A lee-board.

wood'-en (2), a. [Eng. wood, a.; -en.] Mad.

"A dog in the wood or a wooden dog."

Peete: Old Wives' Tale, i. 1.

wood'-en-ly, adv. [Eng. wooden (1); -ly.] In a wooden manner; clumsily, stiffly, stupidly.

"How woodenly he would excuse himself."—North: Life of Lord Guilford, ii. 22.

†wood'-en-ness, s. [English wooden (1); -ness.] Want of spirit or expression; clumsiness, awkwardness.

"One of them has produced more wooden pages than all other living writers (of the same rank) put together; but fortunately the woodenness does little or no harm."—Contemporary Review, April, 1877, p. 947.

wood'-fāll, s. [Eng. wood (1), s., and fall, s.] A fall or cutting of timber.

"The woodfalls this year do not amount to half the sum."—Bacon.

wood'-fōr'-dī-a, s. [Named after J. Woodford, who wrote an account of the plants round Edinburgh in 1824.]

Bot.: A genus of Lythraceæ, now separated from Grislea, of which it was formerly considered a synonym. Woodfordia (Grislea*) tomentosa or floribunda, common in India, has a much-branched stem, sessile lanceolate leaves, covered beneath with white down, and axillary cymes of beautiful scarlet or purple flowers in immense profusion. It yields a gum like gum-tragacanth. The flowers, with alum for a mordant, give a red dye, occasionally used in India for silk. The leaves and flowers, together with the bark of Zizyphus xylopyra, are employed in tanning. Medicinally the dried flowers are stimulant and astringent; they are used by Hindu doctors simply in bowel complaints, with curdled milk in dysentery, and with honey in menorrhagia, also as an external application in hæmorrhages and in ulcers.

wood'-hēad, wode-hede, s. [Eng. wood, a.; -head.] Madness, fury.

"Lucifer fel for his woodhede."—Hampole: Psalms.

wood'-hew-ēr (ew as ū), s. [Eng. wood, s., and hew.]

Ornithology:

1. A popular name for the genus Xiphocolaptes (q. v.). Xiphocolaptes emigrans is the Northern Woodhewer.

2. (Pl.): The sub-family Dendrocolaptinæ (q. v.).

wood'-ie, wūd'-dŷ, s. [WOOD, s., or, perhaps, a corruption of withe (q. v.).] The gallows; also a withe, or rope of twisted wands, in which malefactors seem formerly to have been hanged.

"Half the country will see how ye'll grace the woodie."
—Scott: Guy Mannering, ch. xxviii.

fāte, fāt, fāre, amidst, whāt, fāll, father; wē, wēt, hēre, camēl, hēr, thēre; pine, pīt, sīre, sīr, marine; gō, pōt, or, wōre, wōlf, wōrk, whō, sōn; mūte, cūb, cūre, unite, cūr, rūle, fūll; trŷ, Sŷrian. æ, œ = ē; ey = ā. qu = kw.

wood'-i-něss, *wood-i-ness, s. [Eng. woody; ness.] The quality or state of being woody.

"Now ye shall meet with some fruits, that neither without in shell, nor within forth in kernell, have any of this woodiness."—P. Holland: Pliny, bk. xv., ch. xxviii.

wood'-ish, a. [Eng. wood (1), s.; -ish.] Sylvan.

"The many mirthful jests, and wanton woodish sports." Drayton: Polyolbion, s. 11.

wood'-kěrn, s. [Eng. wood (1), s., and kern.] A robber who infests woods; a forest-haunting bandit. (P. Holland.)

wood'-land, s. & a. [Eng. wood (1), s., and land.]

A. As subst.: Land covered with woods; land on which trees are suffered to grow, either for fuel or timber.

"When mute in the woodlands thine echoes shall die." Scott: Last Words of Cadwallon, i.

B. As adj.: Pertaining or relating to woods; sylvan.

"Shot to Olympus from the woodland shade." Pope: Homer's Odyssey, x. 368.

woodland-caribou, s.

Zoöl.: A large variety of Tarandus rangifer. It is confined to the southern and more woody parts of the fur countries of North America. [CARIBOU, REINDEER.]

wood'-land-ēr, subst. [Eng. woodland; -er.] A dweller in the woodlands.

"Friend and fellow woodlander." Keats: Endymion, ii. 843.

wood'-lark, s. [Eng. wood (1), s., and lark.]

Ornith.: Alauda arborea, differing from the Skylark (q. v.) in its smaller size, its shorter tail, more distinctly marked breast, and a conspicuous light-colored streak extending over each eye and the ear-coverts. Its note has neither the power nor variety of the Skylark, but is superior in quality of tone and is longer in duration. The nest is composed of grasses, moss, and hair, placed on the ground; eggs usually four or five, white covered with little red-brown spots.

"High in air, and pois'd upon his wings Unseen, the soft enamor'd woodlark sings." Gilbert White: Naturalist's Summer-Evening Walk.

wood'-less, a. [Eng. wood (1), s.; -less.] Destitute of woods; without timber.

"Arable and woody and . . . woodless land."—Fuller: Worthies; Norfolk, ii. 124.

wood'-less-něss, s. [Eng. woodless; -ness.] The quality or state of being woodless.

woôd'-lŷ, *wode-ly, adv. [Eng. wood, a.; -ly.] Madly, furiously.

"The bishops therefore and their seruantes, with a great stiere and shoue cried woodyly out: Crucifie him, crucifie him."—Udall: John xix.

wood'-māi-dēn, subst. [Eng. wood (1), s., and maiden.] A wood-nymph; a dryad.

"Such as Amadriades Were cleped woodmaidens." Romaunt of the Rose.

wood'-man, †woodŝ'-man, s. [Eng. wood (1), s., and man.]

1. A forest officer appointed to take care of woods; a forester.

*2. A sportsman, a hunter.

"He's a better woodman than thou takest him for."—Shakesp.: Measure for Measure, iv. 3.

3. One who lives in the woods.

"They lend a certain domestic charm to the lonely hut that makes the solitary woodman feel he is not alone."—Scribner's Magazine, August, 1877, p. 423.

4. One who fells timber; a wood-cutter.

Woodmen of America, Fraternity of Modern, s. A fraternal benefit society organized in 1883. In 1898 it reported a membership of 324,988, and benefits disbursed since organization, $11,070,635.

Woodmen of the World, s. A fraternal benefit society founded in 1891. In 1898 it reported a total membership in the U. S. of 127,000, and benefits disbursed since organization, $3,722,918.

wood'-pěck, s. [Eng. wood (1), s., and peck, v.] The woodpecker (q. v.).

wood'-pěck-ēr, subst. [Eng. wood (1), s., and pecker.]

Ornith.: The popular name of the old Linnæan genus Picus, now greatly divided. Woodpeckers have a slender body, powerful beak, and protrusile tongue, which is sharp, barbed, and pointed, and covered with a glutinous secretion derived from glands in the throat, this coating being renewed every time the tongue is drawn within the bill. The tail is stiff, and serves as a support when the birds are clinging to the branches or stems of trees. The plumage is generally of strongly contrasted colors, black and white, or green and yellow, with red marks about the head. Woodpeckers are very widely distributed, but abound chiefly in warm climates. They are solitary in habit, and live in the depths of forests. Fruits, seeds, and insects constitute their food, and in pursuit of the latter they exhibit wonderful dexterity, climbing with astonishing quickness on the trunks and branches of trees, and when, by tapping with their bills, a rotten place has been discovered, they dig vigorously in search of the grubs or larvæ beneath the bark. The common notion that they are injurious to trees is erroneous, as they do more good by preventing the ravages of insects than harm by their pecking. They roost and breed in hollow trunks, or holes in trees, enlarged by their strong, sharp bills; the eggs, which are white, smooth, and glossy, vary considerably in number, and are deposited on a bed of chips at the bottom of the hole.

wood'-pīg-eôn, s. [Eng. wood (1), s., and pigeon.]

Ornithology:

1. Columba palumbus, a well-known bird distributed generally over Europe. Length about seventeen or eighteen inches; head, chin, and part of neck blue-gray, rest of neck and breast purple-red; bare skin at base of bill nearly white; feathers on side of neck tipped with white so as to form portions of oblique rings; upper parts and wings slaty bluish-gray; plumage of hen less brilliant. Varieties more or less spotted with white often occur, and perfect albinos are sometimes met with. The food of the Woodpigeon consists of corn and grain, beechmast, peas, tares, acorns, the young shoots of turnip-tops, and spring-sown corn; and, as these birds make no return to the farmer by destroying his insect foes, their rapid increase is a source of grave anxiety to agriculturists. The nest of the Woodpigeon is a mere platform of loose sticks, so carelessly constructed that eggs and young birds are often blown therefrom and destroyed. The eggs are always two in number, white and oval; two and sometimes three broods are produced in the year. The ordinary flight is very strong and rapid, and, if disturbed, the bird springs into the air with a peculiar flapping of the wings, which may be heard at a considerable distance.

2. Columba œnas.

"As to the wild woodpigeon, the œnas, or Vinago, of Ray, I am much of your mind; and see no reason for making it the origin of the common house dove; but suppose those that have advanced that opinion may have been misled by another appellation often given to the œnas, which is that of stock-dove."—White: Selborne, lett. xlv. (To Pennant.)

wood'-reēve, s. [Eng. wood (1), s., and reeve.]

A steward or overseer of a wood.

"But there was no woodreeve in the House of Commons, and so the English woods were voted to destruction."—St. James's Gazette, May 25, 1886.

wood'-rōck, s. [Eng. wood (1), s., and rock.] A name for ligniform asbestos.

wood'-rūff, †wood-rowe, †wood-row-el, *wod-ruffe, subst. [A. S. wuderofe, wudurofe=Asperula, odorata, &c.; rofe doubtful. Probably the reference is to the ruff round the stem formed by the verticillate leaves.]

Bot.: The genus Asperula (q. v.), and specially the Sweet Woodruff, Asperula odorata. It is highly fragrant when dried, and is considered a diuretic. Another species, A. cynanchina, is somewhat astringent.

wood'-ŝi-ā, s. [Named after Joseph Woods (1776-1864), author of The Tourist's Flora.]

Bot.: A genus of Polypodæ. Ferns with pinnate fronds, scattered, roundish sori, having beneath them a cup-shaped involucre, ultimately cut at the edge into many often capillary segments. Known species fourteen; from the eastern hemisphere and North America.

†woodŝ'-man, s. [WOODMAN.]

†wood'-snipe, s. [Eng. wood (1), s., and snipe.]

Ornith.: An old English name for the Woodcock, to distinguish it from the Common Snipe. [SNIPE, subst.]

"Netting woodcocks was at one time the common way of taking them; for they have always been highly esteemed as food. Another method of capture was by 'gins' and 'springes,' and it would seem that in times past the 'woodsnipe' was considered a stupid bird."—St. James's Gazette, March 14, 1887.

woodŝ'-ŷ, a. [Eng. woods, pl. of wood (1), s.; -y.] Belonging to or associated with woods.

wood'-wāl, *woode-wale, *wude-wale, *wud-wal, subst. [For etym. and def. see extract under WHETILE.]

wood-wārd'-i-ā, s. [Named after Thomas Jenkinson Woodward, an English botanist.]

1. Bot.: A genus of Polypodæ. Sorilnear, oblong, or sub-lunate, with an indusium. Found in Madeira, India, Japan, Australia, and the South Sea Islands.

2. Palæobot.: Occurs in the Oligocene and Miocene of Great Britain and the European continent. (Etheridge.)

wood'-ward-ite, s. [After Dr. S. P. Woodward, of the British Museum; suff. -ite (Min.).]

Min.: A mineral occurring in botryoidal groups on the walls of a level of an abandoned mine in Cornwall, England. Color, rich turquoise to greenish blue. Described by Church. Composition: A hydrated sulphate of alumina and protoxide of copper. Subsequent analyses appear to indicate that it is a mixture. Dana puts it as a sub-species of Cyanotrichite (q. v.).

wood'-ŷ, *wood'-ie, a. [Eng. wood (1), s.; -y.]

I. Ordinary Language:

1. Abounding with wood or woods; well wooded.

"Four times ten days I've pass'd Wand'ring this woody maze,"

Milton: P. R., ii. 246.

2. Consisting or composed of wood; ligneous.

"In the woody parts of plants, which are their bones, the principles are so compounded as to make them flexible without joints, and also elastic."—Grew.

3. Of the nature of wood.

"Herbs are those plants whose stalks are soft, and have nothing woody in them, as grass and hemlock."—Locke: Elements Nat. Philos., ch. ix.

*4. Pertaining to, connected with, or inhabiting the woods; sylvan.

"The woody nymphs, fair Hamadryades,"

Spenser: F. Q., I. i. 18.

II. Bot.: Having the texture of wood.

woody-fiber, woody-tissue, s.

Bot.: Fiber or tissue, consisting of very long, thin membranous tubes, tapering at each end; the tissue of which wood is composed; Pleurencythma (q. v.).

woody-nightshade, s.

Bot.: A common name for Solanum dulcamara. [BITTER-SWEET, SOLANUM.]

woody-stem, s.

Bot.: A stem which has the hardness and texture of ordinary wood, that of a tree or of a shrub, as distinguished from a herbaceous stalk or stem.

woôd, pa. par. or a. [WOO.]

woô'-ēr, *wo-er, *wow-er, *wow-ere, s. [A. S. wógere, from wógan=to woo (q. v.).] One who woos; one who courts or solicits in love; a suitor.

"They all are wanton wooers."

Wordsworth: To the Small Celandine.

woof-bab, subst. The garter knot below the knee with a couple of loops. (Scotch.) (Burns: Halloween.)

woôf, s. [A corrupt. of Mid. Eng. oof, due to a supposed derivation from weave, with which it is ultimately connected; A. S. ōwef=a woof; also ōweb, āweb, frequently contracted to āb. These words are compounds, containing the prefix ā or ō, shortened forms of on=on; so that oof=on-wef, i. e., on-web=the web that is laid on or thrown across the first set of threads or warp. (Skeat.)] [WEAVE, WEFT.]

1. The threads that cross the warp; the weft.

*2. Cloth; hence, fig., texture.

"Of massy Stygian woof."—Thomson: Summer, 1,686.

woôf'-ŷ, adj. [Eng. woof; -y.] Having a close texture; dense; as, a woofy cloud.

woô'-gūr-ā, s. [Native Japanese name (?).] (See etym. and def.)

woogura-mole, s.

Zoöl.: A Japanese mole, Talpa woogura, like its European congener, but with the snout produced and the fur of a dingy or tawny color.

woô'-lîng, pr. par., a. & s. [WOO.]

A. As pr. par.: (See the verb.)

B. As adj.: Acting as one who woos; courting.

C. As subst.: The act of soliciting in love; courting; soliciting.

"His wealth had lavished been, his substance spent,

To woo and lose, since ill his wooing sped."

Longfellow: Student's Tale.

woô'-lîng-lŷ, adverb. [Eng. wooing; -ly.] In a wooing manner; enticingly; invitingly; with persuasion to stay.

"Heaven's breath Smells wooingly here."

Shakesp.: Macbeth, i. 6.

wool, *wol, *wolle, *wulle, *woule, s. [A. S. wull, wul; cogn. with Dut. wol; Icel. ull (for vull); Dan. uld; Sw. ull; O. H. Ger. wolla; Ger. wolle; Goth. wulla; Lith. wilna; Russ. volna; Sansc. ūrdā=wool; Latin villus=shaggy hair; vellus=a fleece; Gr. erion, eiros=wool.]

1. The fleece of the sheep; the soft hair which grows on sheep and some other animals, as the alpaca, the vicugna, some species of goats, &c., bōil, bōy; pōut, jōwl; cat, çell, chorus, çhin, bench; go, gem; thin, ðis; sin, aŝ; expect, Xēnophon, exīst. ph=f

-cian, -tian = shān. -tion. -sion = shūn; -tīon, -gion = zhūn. -tious. -cious, -sious = shūs. -ble. -dle, &c. = bel, del.

which in fineness somewhat approaches to fur. The distinction between wool and hair is not radical, one being but a modification of the other. Wool is softer, more curled and twisted, and more flexible than hair, and possesses in a much greater degree the remarkable property of felting. The wool of the same animal differs much on the various parts of the body; that on the back, shoulders, and sides is the best. According to its quality wool is divided into different sorts, which receive different names. A threefold classification into primes, seconds, and thirds is pretty general; but sometimes the wool of a single fleece is divided into as many as ten sorts. Wool is also divided into two classes, known as short or carding wool, which seldom exceeds three or four inches in length, and long or combing wool, varying in length from four to eight inches. The finest wools are of short staple, and the coarser wools usually of long staple. In the United States the more common grades of wool are largely home-grown; the finer are imported from Australia, South America and South Africa. English-bred sheep produce a good, strong combing wool; that of the Scotch breed is somewhat harsher and coarser. The Saxon merinos have long been considered the most valuable in point of fineness of fiber. The wool of the alpaca is superior to the wool of sheep in length, softness, and pliability, and is used for many purposes for which silk was formerly used. The wool of the llama is shorter and more rough.

2. Less strictly applied to some other kinds of hair, and especially to short, thick hair, crisp and curled, like the hair of a negro.

"In the cauldron boil and bake;
Eye of newt and toe of frog,
Wool of bat and tongue of dog."
Shakesp.: Macbeth, iv. 1.

3. Any fibrous or fleecy substance resembling wool; specifically.

(1) In Bot.: A term sometimes applied to fine vegetable fibre such as is found within a seed-vessel. [WOOLLY.]

(2) Metall.: A slag of iron blown by steam into a fibrous form.

(3) The raw material [1.] spun into a yarn or thread, and used for knitting or needlework. [W (1).]

¶ (1) Fancy wool: The name given to the varieties of wool used for fancy articles of dress or house decoration. The chief kinds are: Berlin wool, double and single, used chiefly for woolwork (q. v.); fleecy wools; Scotch fingering, for knitting socks and stockings; Shetland wool, fine and tightly twisted; Pyrenean and Zephyr wool.

(2) Great cry and little wool: Great noise and disturbance out of all proportion to useful results; much ado about nothing.

"Of thine own importance full Exclaim, 'Great cry and little wool!'" Wolcott: P. Pindar, p. 135.

wool-ball, s. A ball or mass of wool; specifically, a small ball of wool found frequently in the stomachs of sheep and other wool-bearing animals.

wool-bearing, a. Producing wool.

wool-burler s. A person who removes the burs or little knots from wool or woollen cloth.

wool-burring, s. The act of teasing wool with burrs or teasels.

wool-carder, s. One who cards wool.

wool-carding, s. An early process in woollen manufacture for disentangling or tearing apart the tussocks of wool, and laying the fibers parallel, preparatory to spinning. It is only the short staple wools that are submitted to this operation, the long staple wools being combed.

wool-comber, subst. One whose occupation is to comb wool.

"Half a dozen wool-combers, perhaps, are necessary to keep a thousand spinners and weavers at work."—Smith: Wealth of Nations, bk. i., ch. x.

wool-combing, s. The act or process of combing wool, generally of the long stapled kind, for the purpose of worsted manufacture. The wool-combing machine separates the long from the short fibers of the wool. The long fibers are also laid in regular order, so that they can be readily spun into yarn. Lister's apparatus clears the long fibers by drawing them through a series of teeth by means of a nipper. A pair of jaws seizes a mouthful of wool, and conveys it into a carrier, which, in its turn, deposits upon the comb a brush, pressing it down on the teeth to a proper depth. Having cleared one end of the staple, it transfers the uncleared end to the rotating comb, from which it is extracted by drawing-rollers. The noils are removed from the comb by another set of rollers. The long, cleared wool is delivered in a continuous sliver from the machine at one point, the noil being passed away at another.

wool-driver, s. One who buys wool and carries it to market.

wool-dyed, a. Dyed in the form of wool or yarn before being made into cloth.

wool-gathering, s. The act of gathering wool; now applied proverbially or figuratively to the indulgence of idle fancies; a foolish or fruitless pursuit. The allusion is probably to the practice of gathering the tufts of wool to be found on shrubs, hedges, &c., which necessitates much wandering about with little result.

"His wits were a wool-gathering as they say."—Burton: Anatomy of Melancholy, pt. i., § 2.

wool-grower, s. A person who breeds sheep for the production of wool.

wool-growing, adj. The business of breeding sheep for the production of wool.

wool-hall, s. A trade market in the woollen districts. (Simmonds.) wool-man, s. A dealer in wool.

wool-mill, s. A mill or factory for manufacturing wool and woollen cloth.

wool-moter, s. A person employed in picking wool and freeing it from lumps of pitch and other impurities. (Simmonds.) wool-packer, subst. One who puts up wool into pack or bales; also, a machine for compressing and tying fleeces.

wool-picker, s. A machine for burring wool.

wool-scribbler, subst. The same as WOOLEN-SCRIBBLER (q. v.).

wool-shears, subst. An instrument for shearing sheep.

wool-staple, s.

1. A city or town where wool used to be brought to the king's staple for sale.
2. The fiber or pile of wool. [STAPLE.] wool-stapler, s.

1. A dealer in wool.
2. A wool-sorter (q. v.).

wool-thistle, s.

Botany: Carduus eriophorus (Britten & Holland). Stem much branched, furrowed, two feet high; leaves semi-amplexicaul, but not decurrent, white and cottony, white beneath, pinnatifid, spinous and hairy, head very large, woolly, involucre globose; flowers pale purple, anthers blue. Young parts cooked and eaten as salad. Called also the Woolly-headed Thistle.

wool-tree, s.

Bot.: The genus Eriodendron (q. v.).

wool-winder, s. A person employed to wind or make up wool into bundles to be packed for sale.

woôld, v. t. [Dut. woelen=to wind, to wrap.]

Naut.: To wrap; particularly to wind a rope round a mast or yard when made of two or more pieces, at the place where they are fished, for the purpose of confining and supporting them.

woôld, s. [WELD (1).]

woôld'-êr, s. [Eng. woold; -er.]

1. Naut.: A stick used for tightly winding a rope round another object, as in fishing a spar.

2. Rope-making: One of the handles of the top. [TOP, s., II. 3.]

woôld'-îng, pa. par., a. & s. [WOOLD, v.]

A. & B. As pa. par. & particip. adj.: (See the verb.)

C. As substantive:

1. The act of winding, as a rope, round a mast.
2. A rope used for binding masts and spars.

wool'-ên, &c. [WOOLLEN, &c.]

¶ Buried in Woollen: [FLANNEL, A. I. 3.]

woollen-draper, s. A retail dealer in woollen cloth, flannels, and the like. (Eng.) woollen-manufacture, s. The act of forming wool into cloth and stuff. The fabrics woven from short wools are distinctively called woollens; those from long wools are termed worsteds. [WORSTED.] The manufacture of cloth was known to the ancient Greeks, Romans, the Hindus, the Jews, &c. (Lev. xiii. 47, 48, xix. 19; Deut. xxii. 11.), but among these people it was chiefly a domestic manufacture. In all probability the Romans first introduced it into Britain. There is little historic mention of it before the thirteenth century. Edward III. improved the manufacture by inviting over Flemings, who were more skillful in it than the English of that time. During subsequent centuries unwise legislation, such as limiting the industry to particular towns, retarded its progress; besides which it was hampered by enactments equally unenlightened regarding wool. [WOOL, ¶.] Notwithstanding all difficulties, it ultimately rooted itself deeply, and of the textile arts is now second only to the cotton manufacture. It is estimated that over 32,000 varieties of goods are manufactured of wool.

woollen-printer, s. A workman who impresses patterns or colors on woollen or mixed fabrics.

woollen-scribbler, s. A machine for combing or preparing wool into thin, downy, translucent layers, preparatory to spinning. (Simmonds.)

Wool'-wich (second w silent), s. [See def.]

Geog.: A parish and market town of England about nine miles east-south-east of London. The town is the seat of a great Government arsenal and dock-yard.

¶ Woolwich and Reading Beds:

Geology: A series of Lower Eocene beds formerly called the Plastic Clay (q. v.). With the exception of the Thanet Sands (q. v.), they are the oldest English Tertiaries. They occur in England both in the London and Hampshire basins, the Thanet Sands underlying them in the former, but being absent from the latter area. In the London basin they are seen chiefly at Blackheath, Woolwich, and Reading. The strata consist of mottled clays and sand with lignite, and one horizon contains rolled flint pebbles derived from the chalk. The Woolwich and Reading beds are of fresh-water, estuarine, and marine origin. An Eocene river flowed from the southwest into the Thames at Woolwich, having in it various shells, Unios, Paludinas, Cyrenas, &c., with plant remains of Ficus, Laurus, &c. In the lowest beds, which are more marine, banks of Oysters (Ostrea bellovicina) occur. The fauna comprises 72 genera and 123 species. Among them are turtles and a mammal (Coryphodon). The Plastic clay exists in the Paris basin, with the same remains.

Drayton: Polyolbion, s. 25.

woot, v. i. [WOT.]

woôtz, subst. [Etym. doubtful.] A very superior quality of steel, made in the East Indies, and imported into America and Europe for superior edge-tools. It is used in the manufacture of the celebrated sword-blades of the East. Professor Faraday attributed its excellence to the presence of a small quantity of aluminium, but other analyses show no trace of aluminium. Wootz is believed to be made by a process direct from the ore.

woô'-yên, yá'-ên, s. [Chinese name.]

Zoöl.: Hylobates pileatus, a Gibbon (q. v.), from a small island near Cambaja. Little is known of the habits of this species, the individuals of which differ greatly in coloration at different periods of their lives. II. Technically:

1. Mech.: The overcoming of resistance; the result of one force overcoming another; the act of producing a change of configuration in a system in opposition to a force which resists that change. In America and England the unit of work is taken as a weight of one pound lifted one foot.

"In all cases in which we are accustomed to speak of work being done—whether by men, horse-power, or steam-power, and however various the products may be in different cases—the physical part of the process consists solely in producing or changing motion, or in keeping up motion in opposition to resistance, or in a combination of these actions."—Atkinson: Ganot; Physics, § 60.

2. Min.: Ores before they are cleaned or dressed.

3. Script. & Theol.: In Rom. xi. 6, work is used in the singular as opposed to grace; much more frequently the term is plural (works), and often constitutes an antithesis to faith (Rom. iii. 27). Sometimes the expression is "the works of the law" (Rom. ix. 32), also "dead works" which require to be repented of (Heb. vi. 1, ix. 14). A fundamental distinction is drawn between the works of the flesh (Gal. v. 19-21) and the fruit of the spirit (22-23). The Protestant doctrine is, that man is justified by faith made manifest by works (Rom. iii. 28, cf. James ii. 17-26) but is judged by works (Matt. xvi. 27; xxv. 31-46), those which are the fruit of faith being acceptable to God (Rom. vi. 1-23, viii. 1-4; Heb. xi. 5), those not having this origin being unacceptable (Heb. xi. 6). Cf. the twelfth, thirteenth, and fourteenth of the Thirty-nine Articles, the Confession of Faith, ch. xvi., &c. A controversy arose in the sixteenth century on the necessity of good works to salvation. Melancthon was accustomed to admit this necessity. The more rigid Lutherans considered his views on the subject a departure from those of their Master. Major, in 1552, defended Melancthon's opinion against Nicholas Amsdorf, who maintained that good works are pernicious to salvation. Major made a partial retraction, and in 1577 the controversy was terminated by the Formula of Concord. [FORMULA, s., ¶ (2).]

¶ Work is the general term, as including that which calls for the exertion of our strength; labor differs from it in the degree of exertion required, it is hard work; toil expresses a still higher degree of painful exertion; drudgery implies a mean and degrading work, and is the lot of those lowest in society. Work is more or less voluntary, but a task is work imposed by others.

(1) Used as an epithet of scorn, disgust, or contempt, sometimes of contemptuous pity; a poor, groveling, debased, despised creature.

"Poor worm, thou art infected."

Shakesp.: Tempest, iii. 1.

(2) Applied to one who silently, slowly, and persistently works or studies; as, a bookworm.

(3) Applied to something that slowly and silently eats or works its way internally to the destruction or pain of the object affected; as—

(a) The emblem of corruption, decay, or death.

"Thus chides she Death,

Grim-grinning ghost, earth's worm, what dost thou mean?"

Shakesp.: Venus and Adonis, 933.

(b) An emblem of the gnawing torments of conscience; remorse.

"The worm of conscience still begnaw thy soul."

Shakesp.: Richard III., i. 3.

(4) Anything resembling a worm in appearance, especially when in motion; anything vermicular or spiral; as—

(a) The spiral of a corkscrew.

(b) The thread on the shaft or core of a screw.

(c) A sharp-pointed spiral tool, used for boring soft rock; that which is too hard to be pierced by the auger, but not hard enough to require the jumper.

(d) A spiral wire on the end of the ramrod or rammer, for withdrawing a charge; a wadhook.

(e) A spiral pipe in a condenser; a continuation of the neck or beak.

fāte, fāt, fāre, amidst, whāt, fāl, father; wē, wēt, hēre, camēl, hēr, thēre; pine, pīt, sīre, sīr, marine; gō, pōt, or, wōre, wōlf, wōrk, whō, sōn; mūte, cūb, cūre, unite, cūr, rāle, fūll; trȳ, Sȳrian. æ, œ = ē; ey = ā. qu = kw.

(f) A small vermicular ligament under the tongue of a dog. This ligament is frequently cut out when the animal is young, for the purpose of checking a disposition to gnaw at everything. The operation was formerly supposed to check rabies or madness.

"In dogs . . . the worm may help by its elasticity, and that of its sheath, in the act of lapping."—Owen: Anatomy of Vertebrates, iii. 197.

II. Technically:

1. Zoöl.: Any individual of the phylum Vermes (q. v.). They differ greatly in outward appearance, and in habits, and very many are parasitic in other animals. They do not move by means of articulated limbs, nor is the body jointed like that of a crustacean or an insect. But whatever shape the body may assume, it is composed of incomplete segments, the majority of which are similar, and is more or less ringed externally. The segments are provided with offensive and locomotive organs on both sides, and usually with a special excretory organ opening from within. There is a water-system communicating with the perivisceral cavity and with the outside. The digestive system is often fairly developed, but in some parasites it is wanting, and these are nourished by absorption through the body walls. A kind of circulatory system is sometimes present, as are special organs of respiration, such as the branchial filaments of the Terebellidae; but both are also often absent. The nervous system may consist of a cord round the oesophagus, with ganglia above and below, and a ganglionic cord along the ventral surface within; or there may be but faint traces of the system. Sense-organs may exist in a rudimentary condition. The organs and structures of the body are, to a great extent, the same on both sides, and hence there is bilateral symmetry.

2. Pathol.: Many species of intestinal worms infest the human frame. The chief are Trichocephalus dispar, the Long Threadworm [TRICHOCEPHALUS]; Ascaris lumbricoides, the Large Round Worm [ASCARIS]; Oxyuris vermicularis [OXYURIS], the Small Threadworm, Sclerostoma, or Anchylostoma duodenale [SCLEROSTOMA]; Tænia solium, T. mediocanellata, and Bothriocephalus latus [TAPEWORM].

wōr'-ship, *worth-schip-en, *wor-schip, *wor-shep-en, *wor-schipe, *wor-shyp, *wor-shyppe, v. t. & i. [WORSHIP, s.]

A. Transitive:

*1. To pay honor to; to honor. (See extract under A. 2.)

2. To treat or regard with reverence, respect, or admiration.

"A phrase in one of our occasional Services, 'with my body I thee worship,' has perplexed and sometimes offended those who were unacquainted with the early uses of the word, and thus with the intention of the actual framers of that Service. Clearly in our modern sense of 'worship,' this language would be inadmissible. But 'worship' or 'worthship' meant 'honor' in our early English, and 'to worship' to honor, this meaning of 'worship' still very harmlessly surviving in 'worshipful,' and in the title of 'your worship' addressed to the magistrate on the bench. So little was it restrained of old to the honor which man is bound to pay to God, that it is employed by Wycliffe to express the honor which God will render to his faithful servants and friends. Thus our Lord's declaration, 'If any man serve Me, him will my Father honor,' in Wycliffe's translation reads thus, 'If any man serve Me, my Father shall worship him.'"—Trench: English Past and Present, lect. vii.

3. To pay divine honors to; to adore; to reverence with supreme respect and veneration; to perform religious service to.

"They went and served other gods, and worshiped them."—Deuteronomy xxix. 26.

4. To love or admire inordinately; to devote one's self to; to idolize, to adore; to treat as divine.

"With bended knees I daily worship her."

Carew. (Todd.)

B. Intransitive:

1. To love or admire a person inordinately.

2. To perform acts of worship or adoration; to perform religious services.

wōr'-ship-a-bīl'-i-tȳ, subst. [English worshipable]; -ity.] The quality or state of being worthy to be worshiped; the capability of being worshiped. (Coleridge.)

wōr'-ship-a-ble, adj. [Eng. worship; -able.] Capable or worthy of being worshiped.

wōr'-ship-ēr, wor'-ship-per, *wor-schip-er, *wor-shyp-per, s. [Eng. worship, v.; -er.] One who worships; one who pays divine honors to any being; one who adores.

"I, so long

A worshiper of Nature, hither came."

Wordsworth: Tintern Abbey.

¶ A small sect, calling themselves "Worshippers of God," appeared for the first time in the Registrar-General's returns for the year 1880.

Formed from the pa. par. of the strong verb signifying "to fight," or "suffer," represented in A. S. by winnan=to strive, to fight, to suffer; pa. par. wunnen. (Skeat.)] bōil, bōy; pōut, jōwl; cat, çell, chorus, çhin, bench; go, gem; thin, thís; sin, aș; expect, Xenophon, exíst. ph = f. -cian, -tian = șan. -tion, -sion = șñn; -țion, -șion = zhñ. -tious, -cious, -sious = șñs. -ble, -dle, &c. = bēl, dēl.

1. A breach or rupture of the skin and flesh of an animal caused by violence, or, in surgical phrase, a solution of continuity in any of the soft parts of the body occasioned by external violence, and attended with a greater or less amount of bleeding. Wounds are classified as follows:

(1) Cuts, incisions, or incised wounds, produced by sharp-edged instruments.

(2) Stabs or punctured wounds, made by the thrusts of pointed weapons.

(3) Contused wounds, produced by the violent application of hard, blunt, obtuse bodies to the soft parts.

(4) Lacerated wounds, in which there is tearing or laceration, as by some rough instrument.

(5) Gunshot wounds.

(6) Poisoned wounds, wounds complicated with the introduction of some poison or venom into the part.

"Where sharp the pang, and mortal is the wound."
Pope: Homer's Iliad, xiii. 719.

¶ Wounds which have severed only muscles and the blood-vessels and nerves connected with them heal more easily than those which affect the tendons. As a rule wounds made by a sharp weapon or instrument heal more quickly than bruises produced by the blow of a weapon which is blunt; as, for instance, a club. When an artery is severed, bright red blood is ejected by spurts; when a vein is cut, dark blood comes forth more slowly. In either case nature makes immediate efforts to repair the injury. Even in the case of an artery, the blood after a time tends to flow less freely, and an external coagulum to be formed which ultimately stops its effusion. The object of the surgeon is to stop the flow of blood, to bring together the severed portions of a vessel and keep them together till nature reunites them, using appliances to prevent the access of the atmospheric air with its myriads of germs. In unfavorable cases tetanus results, or pyæmia, or both.

2. Any injury to the bark and wood of a tree, or of the bark and substance of other plants.

3. Any hurt, pain, or injury; as, a wound to credit or reputation. Especially applied to the pangs of love.

"And gives our heart a wound that nothing heals."
Cowper: Death of Damon.

The form of the root is wrin=to neigh (as a horse), to squeal (as a pig), used of various animals, and, as applied to the wren, it may be taken=to chirp, to twitter.]

Ornithology:

1. The popular name for any of the Troglodytidae (q. v.), especially Troglodytes parvulus, the Common Wren, widely dispersed over North America and Europe. Length about four inches; color rich reddish-brown, paling on the under-surface, and darkening into dusky brown upon the quill-feathers of the wing and tail. The outer webs of the wing-coverts are sprinkled with reddish-brown spots, and there are bars of the same hue on the short tail-feathers. Bill slender, rather long in proportion to the size of the bird. The nest is large, generally oval, and dome-shaped at the top, with a small hole at one end or in the side. (See extract.)

"The Wren has a curious habit which does not seem as yet to be satisfactorily explained, though most authors have had something to say about it. Near any unoccupied nest may generally be found one or more nests of imperfect construction. The widespread belief in the country is that they are built by the male bird for his own lodging at night, and hence they are commonly known as 'cocks' nests.'"—Yarnell: British Birds (ed. 4th), i. 463.

2. The name is also applied to several of the Sylviidae, with which the Common Wren was formerly classed. Regulus cristatus is the Golden-crested, and R. ignicapillus the Fire-crested Wren, &c.

wrëñ'-ning, s. [Eng. wren; -ing.] Chasing the wren (q. v.). (See compound.)

wrenning-day, s.

Folk-lore: The name given in the south of Ireland to St. Stephen's Day (Dec. 26), on which it was formerly the custom to hunt the wren and bear its body in procession from house to house, soliciting contributions toward the cost of a merry-making. Various accounts are given of the origin of this custom, but as in Celtic mythology the wren was regarded as having brought fire from heaven for the use of man, and as somewhat similar customs exist in many other places, it is probable that this hunting the wren had once a mystic meaning in connection with the great festive season of the first twelve nights of the sun's return from the winter solstice, and that the killing of the bird was originally sacrificial.

wrëst, wrast, v. t. & i. [A. S. wrëstan=to twist forcibly; wrëst=firm, strong, from wrädh, pa. t. of wrädhan=to writhe (q. v.); cogn. with Icel. reista=to wrest; Dan. wriste.] [WRESTLE.]

A. As pr. par.: (See the verb.)

B. As adj.: Pertaining to the art or act of writing; used for writing.

C. As substantive:

1. The art or act of forming letters and characters on paper, parchment, wood, stone, or other material, for the purpose of recording ideas or of communicating them to others by visible signs.

abolished. There are no traces of writing in Britain previous to the Roman period. The Runic alphabet, used for many centuries in Denmark, Norway, and Iceland, was based on the Roman. Chinese characters are syllabic, and as Chinese words are monosyllables, they are strictly ideographic. Their system is said to contain 40,000 characters. Sanscrit possesses the most perfect known alphabet; its consonants number forty-three and its vowel signs fourteen. It is written from left to right. [CUNEIFORM, OGHAM, PHONETIC, RUNIC, SHORTHAND.]

2. That which is written; anything written or expressed in letters; as—

(1) An inscription.

"And Pilate wrote a title, and put it on the cross. And the writing was, Jesus of Nazareth the King of the Jews."—John xix. 19.

wrought (as rāt), wraught, wroughte, wrought, pret., pa. par. of v., & a. [WORK, v.]

A. As pret. & pa. par.: (See the verb.)

B. As adjective:

1. Ord. Language: Worked, performed, done, executed, labored, formed.

"From Waltham beforesaid to Westmynster thei him brouht, Biside his fadere is laid in a tounge wele wrought."—Robert de Brunne, p. 341.

2. Carp. & Mason.: A term used by masons and carpenters in contradistinction to rough.

wrought-iron, s. Pig-iron subjected to the process of puddling (q. v.).

wrūng, pret. & pa. par. of v. [WRING.]

wry, wri-en, v. i. & t. [A. S. wrigian=to drive, to impel, to tend or bend toward. Wriggle is a frequent. from this verb. Cf. Goth. wraikws=crooked.]

A. Intransitive:

1. To swerve, move, or go obliquely; to go or move aside; to turn away.

"Than the kyng wryed away fro hym."—Berners: Froissart's Cronycle, vol. i., ch. cxlvii.

2. To deviate from the right path morally; to go wrong or astray.

"These wry too much on the right hand, ascribing to the holy scripture such kind of perfection as it cannot have."—Sandys.

3. To writhe, to wriggle.

"Then talks she ten times worse, and wryes, and wriggles,
As though she had the itch (and so it may be)."—Beaumont & Fletcher: Woman's Prize, iii. 1.

4. To slip, slide, or move away from the proper position.

"The byshops go about to kepe in state stil, and hold vp the decayed partes of their power (whose building was naught, and therefore hath wryed on the one side longe ago)."—Bp. Gardner: Of True Obedience, fol. 53.

5. To bend or wind; to move in a winding or meandering course.

"As when a nymph, arising from the land,
Leadeth a dance with her long watery train
Down to the sea, she wryes to every hand."—Davies: On Dancing.

B. Transitive:

1. To writhe, to twist, to bend, to contort.

"Like a man fastened by his thumbs at the whipping-post, he wries his back and shrinks from the blow, though he knows he cannot get loose."—Bp. Taylor: Dissuasive from Popery, bk. ii., pt. ii. § 6.

2. To distort, to wrest, to cause to deviate.

"They have wrested and wryed his doctrine."—Ralph Robinson. (Anandale.)

wry, wrie, wrye, a. & s. [WRY, v.]

A. As adjective:

1. Bent, turned, or twisted to one side in a state of contortion; twisted, distorted, crooked.

"The fyrst that came and gaue them moost comforte was Henry erle of Lancastre with the wrye necke, called Torte colle."—Berners: Froissart's Cronycle, vol. i., ch. xi.

*2. Crooked; meandering; not following a straight or direct line.

"There intricately among the woods doth wander, Losing himselfe in many a wry meander."

Broune: Britannia's Pastorals, i. 2.

3. Exhibiting distaste, disgust, impatience, discontent, or the like; as, He took it with a very wry face.

*4. Deviating from what is right or becoming; misdirected, wrong, false.

"If he now and then make a wry step."—Gilpin: Sermons, vol. iv., ser. 14.

*5. Wrested, perverted.

"He mangles and puts a wry sense upon protestant writers."—Atterbury.

*B. As subst.: A bending or turning from the proper or straight direction; a bend, a turn, a meander.

"The first with divers crooks and turning wries."
P. Fletcher: Purple Island, v.

wry-mouthed, a. Having the mouth awry.

"If e'er they call upon me I'll so fit 'em,
I have a pack of wry-mouth'd mackerel ladies,
Stink like a standing ditch."

Beaumont & Fletcher: Woman Pleas'd, iii. 2.

wry-neck, s.

1. Ornith.: [WRYNECK.]

*2. Pathol.: The same as STIFF-NECK (q. v.).

wry-necked, a. Having a crooked and distorted neck; in the quotation, the epithet refers to the old English flute, or flute à bec, so called from having a curved projecting mouthpiece like a bird's beak.

"The vile squeaking of the wry-necked fife."
Shakespeare: Merchant of Venice, ii. 5.

wryed, a. [Eng. wry, a.; -ed.] Wry, distorted, awry.

"And cry 'Filthy! filthy!' simply uttering their own condition, and using their wryed countenances instead of a vice."—Ben Jonson: Case is Altered, i. 4.

wry'-lŷ, adv. [Eng. wry, adj.; -ly.] In a wry, distorted, or awkward manner.

"Most of them have tried their fortune at some little lottery-office of literature, and, receiving a blank, have chewed upon it harshly and wryly."—Landor: (Anandale).

wry'-neck, s. [See def.]

Ornithology: Any bird of the genus Iunx or Yunx (q. v.); specif. Iunx torquilla, the Common Wryneck. Length about seven inches; general color of upper parts, including the tail, grayish-white, mottled all over with brownish-gray, and obscurely barred and streaked with dark-brown wings, brown barred with dull chestnut on the outer webs of the feathers; under parts buff, each feather with a narrow dark-brown spot near the tip. Little or no variation in the female. It feeds on caterpillars and other insects, and is often seen near ant-hills in search of the cocoons, popularly known as "ant's eggs." The construction of the protuberant tongue resembles that of the woodpecker, and the organ is furnished with glands secreting a glutinous mucus which causes the prey to adhere to its horny tip. The Wryneck rarely makes a nest, or at best but a very poor one, usually depositing its eggs in some hole in a tree. The name Wryneck is derived from the bird's habit of writhing its head and neck in various directions with a serpentine motion. It has a number of other popular names [CUCKOO'S MATE, TURKEY-BIRD], and is probably the Hobby-bird of Browne (Birds of Norfolk). His description, "marvelously subject to the vertigo," refers, in Seeborn's opinion, to the Wryneck's habit of feigning death when taken; while Wilkin thinks it is founded on the "singular motion of its head and neck." The actual habitat of the bird is Central Europe and Asia.

"That curious bird the wryneck, so dear to the classical scholar from its associations with witchcraft in Theocritus and Virgil, is the first to arrive; and certainly the weird manner in which its head seems to turn every way, as if on a pivot, while mouselike it crawls up and round an old well, goes far to account for its reputation as an uncanny bird."—St. James's Gazette, March 9, 1887.

wry'-ness, wry-nesse, s. [Eng. wry, a.; -ness.]

1. Lit.: The quality or state of being wry or distorted; crookedness.

*2. Fig.: Deviation from what is right.

"This is light enough to all intelligent persons, for an exploring the rectitude or wrynesse of their behaviors in this particular."—Mountagu: Devout Essays, part i., treat. 15.

wūd, a. [WOOD, a.] (Scotch.)

wūd'-dīe, wūd'-dŷ, s. [WOODIE.]

wūlf'-en-ite, s. [After the Austrian mineralogist, Wulfen; suff. -ite (Min.).]

Min.: A mineral occurring mostly in crystals; system, tetragonal. Hardness, 2.75-3; specific gravity, 6.03-7.01; luster, resinous to adamantine; color, shades of yellow, siskin and olive green, sometimes orange or bright red. Composition: Molybdic acid, 38.5; protoxide of lead, 61.5=100, corresponding with the formula PbOMO₃. The orange and red colored varieties owe their color to the presence of vanadic acid.

wull, s. & v. i. [WILL, s. & v.] (Scotch.)

wum-il, s. [WIMBLE.] (Scotch.)

wūr'-rūs, wār'-ās, s. [The African name of the powder.]

Comm.: A powder sold in African bazaars as an anthelmintic and a dye plant. It was long believed to be identical with kamala (q. v.), but it has been shown by Capt. Hunter, Assistant Resident at Aden, that wurrus consists of the glandular hairs on the legumes of Flemingia congesta, wild in Africa and India. (Calcutta Exhib. Report, pt. v., 174.)

wūrtz'-ite, subst. [After the French chemist, Adolphe Wurtz; suff. -ite (Min.).]

Min.: A dimorphous form of blende (q. v.). Crystallization, hexagonal, being isomorphous with greenockite. Hardness, 3.5-4; specific gravity, 3.98; luster, vitreous; color and streak, brownish to brownish-black. Found crystallized near Ouro, Bolivia. Breithaupt states that the radiated (cadmiferous) blende of Przibram, Bohemia, is hexagonal in crystallization; his Späuterite (q. v.).

wūr'-zel, s. [Ger. wurzel=root.] [MANGOLD-WURZEL.]

wusse, adv. [A variant of -wis in ywis (q. v.).] Certainly.

"I hope you will not a-hawking now, will you?
No, wusse, but I'll practice against next year, uncle."
Ben Jonson.

wūth'-ēr, v. i. [From the sound.] To rustle, as the wind among trees; to make a sullen roar. (Prov.)

"Wuthering Heights is the name of Mr. Heathcliff's dwelling, wuthering being a significant provincial adjective descriptive of the atmospheric tumult to which its station is exposed in stormy weather."—C. Brontë: Wuthering Heights, ch. i.

wūth'-ēr, s. [WUTHER, v.] The sound made by the rustling of the wind among the branches of trees. (Prov.) wūz'-zēnt, a. [WIZZENED.] Dried, withered. (Scotch.)

wŷch (1), s. [WITCH (2).]

wych-elm, s. [WITCH-ELM.]

wych-hazel, s. [WITCH-HAZEL.]

wŷch (2), s. [WICK(1), s.] (See extract.)

"The principal occupation is the manufacture of the salt obtained from the brine springs, or wyches, to which the town probably owes both its name and its origin."—Encyc. Brit. (ed. 9th), vii. 471.

wych-house, s. (See extract.)

"The houses in which salt is manufactured are called wych-houses."—Woodward: Geol. of Eng. & Wales, p. 132.

wych-waller, s. A salt-boiler at a wych. (Cheshire.)

Wŷc'-liff-ite, s. & a. [See def.]

A. As substantive:

Eccles. & Church Hist.: The followers of John Wycliffe, Wiclif, or de Wiclif, &c. (there are about twenty ways of spelling the name). He was born at Hipswell, near Richmond, England, about A. D. 1324, and was educated at Oxford University. He is believed to have been in conflict with the Mendicant Orders about 1360, but none of his extant writings on the subject seem to have been penned at so early a date. In or about that year he obtained the wardenship of Balliol Hall, exchanged about 1365 for that of Canterbury Hall, which he soon lost, on account of alleged mental incapacity in the archbishop from whom he received the appointment. This deprivation was confirmed on appeal both by the Pope and the king. In July, 1374, he was nominated member of a legation to Pope Gregory XI.

bōil, bōy; pōut, jōwl; cat, çell, chorus, çhin, bençh; go, gem; thin, thiŷ; sin, aŷ; expect, Xenophon, exist. ph=f. -cian, -tian=shan. -tion, -sion=shūn; -tŷion, -gŷion=zhūn. -tious, -cious, -sious=shūs. -ble, -dle, &c.=bel, del.

about Papal provisions, or reservation of churches. On February 3, 1377, he was summoned to appear before a Convocation of the Clergy on a charge of heresy, which ended abortively. On May 22, 1377, five Papal bulls were issued against him, and next year a second ecclesiastical trial took place, the Londoners, who are said to have been opposed to him on the former occasion, taking his part on this. In May, 1382, a synod of divines condemned his opinions, which led to his being prevented from any longer teaching in the University. In 1381 he issued sixteen theses against transubstantiation. Apparently about 1380 or 1381 he published the translation into English of the Bible and Apocrypha from the Latin Vulgate; a second edition or retranslation, less literal but smoother in style, was issued by John Purvey about A. D. 1388. This was after the death of Wycliffe, which took place in the parish of Lutterworth, in Leicestershire, of which he was rector, on December 31, 1384. On May 2, 1415, the Council of Constance condemned Wycliffe's tenets, and ordered that his books should be destroyed and his body dug up and burnt. [For his tenets see LOLLARDISM, for his followers LOLLARDS. See also HUSSITES.]

B. As adj.: Of or belonging to Wycliffe, his tenets or followers. [A.]

wȳe, s. [See def.] A Y or crotch. Used in many ways as a temporary shore or brace. Also a name applied to a stem or pipe with branches, as a stand-pipe or delivery-pipe with two issues from its summit. One of the supports of a telescope, theodolite, or leveling instrument. Written also Y.

Wyke'-ham-ist, s. [See def.] A name applied to the boys at Winchester College, England, founded by William of Wykeham (1324-1404), Bishop of Winchester. Used also adjectively.

"From 700 to 800 Wykehamists assembled on Saturday to take part in the five-hundredth anniversary of the laying of the foundation-stone of the Winchester College."—St. James's Gazette, March 28, 1887.

wȳl'-le, a. [Etym. doubtful.] (See compound.)

wylie-coat, s. A boy's flannel underdress next the shirt; a flannel-petticoat. [Scotch.]

"Or aiblins some bit duddie boy, On's wylie-coat." Burns: To a Louse.

wȳ-mot, wy-mole, *wys-mal-va, s. [WIMOT.]

wynd (y as ā), s. [WIND, v.] An alley, a lane. [Scotch.]

"Among the closes and wynds."—Scott: Redgauntlet, ch. xxi.

wȳnn, s. [Etym. doubtful.] A kind of timber-truck or carriage. [Simmonds.]

Wȳ-ō'-mīng, s. [Etym. doubtful.] Probably a corruption of Am. Indian maughwauwame=the great plains. One of the States of the U. S. A. Bounded W. by Idaho, N. by Montana, E. by S. Dakota and Nebraska, and S. by Utah and Colorado. Area, 97,890 square miles. Admitted as a State July 10, 1890. Cheyenne is the capital.

wyte, v. t. [WITE, v.]

wyte, s. [WITE.]

wȳth, s. [WITHE]

Botany: Tournefortia bicolor. [WHITE-HOOP.]

wȳ-vērn, wī'-vērn, subst. [Mid. Eng. wivere=a serpent (Chaucer: Troilus and Cressida, iii. 1.012), with excrescent n, as in bittern, from O. Fr. wivre=a serpent, viper; French givre=a viper, from Latin vipera. Wyvern and viper are doublets.] [QUAVIVER, VIPER.]

Her.: An imaginary animal; a kind of dragon with wings, but having only two legs, the termination of its body being somewhat serpentine in form.

Wyvern.

THE twenty-fourth letter of the English alphabet, is a superfluous letter, as it represents no sound which cannot be expressed by other letters. Thus, when used at the beginning of a word it has precisely the sound of z; when occurring in the middle of a word it usually has the sound of ks, as in axis, taxes, foxes, &c.; it also has the same sound in some cases when terminating a word, as lax, wax, &c.; when it terminates a syllable, and more especially an initial syllable, if the syllable following it is open or accented, it frequently has the sound of gz, as in luxury, exhaust, exalt, exotic, &c. As an initial it occurs only in words of Greek origin, or formed from Greek words, most of these formations being of a scientific or technical nature.

¶ 1. X as a symbol is used:

(1) In numer.: For ten, in this case being composed of two Vs (=5) placed one above the other, the lower one being inverted. When placed horizontally (X) it stands for a thousand, and with a dash over it (X̄) it represents ten thousand.

(2) In ordinary writing X is frequently used as an abbreviation for Christ. In this case the symbol is not the same letter as the English X, but represents the Greek X (=Ch), as in Xn=Christian, Xmas=Christmas.

2. X as used on beer-casks is said to have originally been employed to indicate beer which had paid ten shillings duty.

X-rays, s. [ROENTGEN RAYS.]

xānth-, pref. [XANTHO-]

xānth-tha-mide, subst. [Pref. xanth-, and Eng. amide.]

Chem.: C₃H₇ONS=COS(C₂H₅)NH₂. A crystalline substance produced by passing ammoniacal gas into an alcoholic solution of xanthic ether. Insoluble in water, but soluble in alcohol and ether.

xānth-thān, s. [Gr. xanthos = yellow; Eng. suff. -an.]

Chem.: Berzelius' name for the group Cy₂S₃, regarded as the radicle of persulpho-cyanic acid.

xānth-tha-rin, s. [Formed from Eng. xanthate (q. v.).]

Chem.: Xanthil. An oily, fetid compound, supposed by Couerbe to be produced by the dry distillation of xanthic ether. (Watts.)

†xānth-ar-pȳ-i-a, s. [Pref. xanth-, and Latin harpysia.] [HARPYA.]

Zool.: A genus of Pteropodidae, closely allied to Pteropus, with a single species, Xantharpyia amplexicaudata, from the Austro-Malayan sub-region.

xānth-thate, s. [Eng. xanth(ic); -ate.]

Chem.: A salt of xanthic acid.

xanthate of potassium, s.

Chem.: C₃H₅OXS₂. Obtained by adding carbonic disulphide to a saturated alcoholic solution of potassic hydrate. It separates in slender, colorless prisms, soluble in water and alcohol, insoluble in ether. Gradually destroyed by exposure to the air.

xānth-thāz'-a-rin, s. [Pref. xanth-, and English a(l)izarin.]

Chem.: A yellow coloring matter, prepared by the action of nitric acid on the black residue obtained in preparing pure alizarin. It is slightly soluble in water, soluble in alcohol, ether, and in caustic alkalies.

xānth-thē-in, subst. [Formed from Gr. xanthos = yellow.]

Chem.: Fremy's name for that portion of the yellow coloring matter of flowers which is soluble in water.

xānth-ē-lās'-ma, subst. [Pref. xanth-, and Gr. elasma=a metal plate.]

Pathol.: The name given by Dr. Erasmus Wilson to a cutaneous disease, consisting of isolated or confluent tubercles varying from the size of a pin's head to that of a pea. Its most frequent seat is around the eyelids.

xānth-thē-lēne, subst. [Pref. xanth-; Eng. e(thy), and suff. -lene.]

Chem.: Zeise's name for an oil produced by precipitating potassic ethylsulpho-carbonate with a cupric salt.

xānth-thī-a, s. [Gr. xanthos=yellow.]

Entom.: A genus of Orthosidae, with wings forming a very inclined roof. The caterpillar feeds on the buds or the catkins of trees. The type is Xanthia cerago, the Sallow-moth (q. v.).

xānth-thī-an, a. (See def.) Of or belonging to Xanthus, an ancient town in Asia Minor.

xanthian-marbles, s. pl.

Classic Antiq.: A large collection of marbles of various ages (from B. C. 545 onwards) discovered near Xanthus, in 1538.

xānth-thic, adj. [Gr. xanthos=yellow, and Eng. suff. -ic.]

Chem.: Derived from or contained in xanthic ether, and of a yellow color.

xanthic-acid, s.

Chem.: C₃H₆OS₂. A colorless oily liquid, prepared by decomposing xanthate of potassium with dilute sulphuric or hydrochloric acid. It is heavier than water, has a powerful and peculiar odor, and decomposes at 24° into alcohol and carbonic disulphide. Its salts are yellow.

xanthic-ether, s.

Chem.: (C₂H₅)₂.COS₂. Ethylic disulpho-carbonate. A pale yellowish oil, obtained by the action of ethyl chloride on xanthate of potassium. It is insoluble in water, soluble in all proportions in alcohol and ether, and boils at 210°.

xanthic-oxide, s. [XANTHINE.]

xanthic-series, s. pl. [CYANIC-SERIES.]

xānthīd'-i-ūm, s. [Mod. Lat., dimin. from Gr. xanthos=yellow.]

Palaeobot.: A pseudo-genus of Confervaceae, now believed to be sporangia of Desmidiaceae. Microscopic spherical bodies with radiating spines. Fourteen species from the Upper Cretaceous rocks. (Etheridge.)

xānth-thil, s. [Formed from Gr. xanthos=yellow.] [XANTHARIN.]

xānth-thin, s. [Gr. xanthos=yellow; Eng. suffix -in.]

Chem.: A name applied to various substances. By Frémy and Cloez to that portion of the yellow coloring matter of flowers insoluble in water. By Schunck to a yellow coloring matter obtained from madder; and by Couerbe to a gaseous product obtained by the decomposition of xanthates.

xānth-thine, s. [Gr. xanthos=yellow; Eng. suffix -ine.]

Chem.: C₅H₄N₄O₂. Xanthic oxide. An organic base, first discovered and described by Dr. Marcet, as a constituent of a rare form of urinary calculi, but afterward found among the products of the decomposition of guanine. It is prepared by adding potassium nitrate to a solution of guanine in hot concentrated nitric acid, precipitating with water, filtering, dissolving residue in boiling ammonia, treating with a solution of ferrous sulphate as long as black ferrous-ferri-oxide separates, filtering and evaporating the filtrate to dryness. It is a white amorphous powder, difficultly soluble in water, soluble in alkalies and in concentrated acids, and distinguished by the deep yellow color produced when its solution in nitric acid is evaporated to dryness.

xānth-thī-nine, s. [Eng. xanthin; -ine.]

Chem.: C₄H₃N₃O₂. A yellow powder, prepared by heating ammonium thionurate to 200°. It is slightly soluble in boiling water, the solution having a light blue fluorescence, but dissolves readily in nitric and hydrochloric acids.

xānth-in-ō-car'-pin, s. [Pref. xanth-, and Eng. inocarpin.]

Chem.: A yellow coloring matter extracted from the juice which exudes from incisions made in the bark of Inocarpus edulis.

xānth-thī-ō-šite, subst. [Formed from xanthos=yellow.]

Min.: A name given by Adam to an amorphous nickel ore, analysed by Bergemann. Hardness, 4.0; specific gravity, 4.982; color, sulphur-yellow. Composition: Arsenic acid, 50.5; nickel, 49.5=100, whence the formula 3NiOAsO₅. Found at Johanngeorgenstadt, Saxony.

xānth-thīt-āne, s. [Gr. xanthos = yellow, -it connect., and suff. -ane (Min.).]

Min.: A pulverulent mineral found associated with zircon (q. v.) at Green River, Henderson county, North Carolina. Hardness, 3.5; specific gravity, 2.7-3.0. Analysis showed it to consist of titanate acid, with traces of zirconia, and 12.5 per cent. of water. Probably a result of the decomposition of Sphene (q. v.).

xānth-thīte, s. [Greek xanthos=yellow; suff. -ite (Min.).]

Mineral.: A yellowish-brown variety of Idocrase (q. v.), containing 2.80 per cent. of protoxide of manganese. Found near Amity, Orange county, New York.

xānth-thī-ūm, subst. [Gr. xanthos = yellow. So named because an infusion of species of the genus was used by the Greeks to dye their hair.]

Bot.: Burweed; a genus of Senecionideae, subtribe Ambrosieae. Monœcious Composites; the barren flowers having an involucre of few scales, with many capitate flowers on a common receptacle, the fertile ones with a single, prickly, two-beaked involucre entirely closing the flowers, and with apertures for the protrusion of the two stigmas, fruit included in the enlarged and hardened involucre. Xanthium strumarium and X. spinosum are casuals in Britain; the former is a weed common in waste places, on river banks, and near villages in India, and troublesome to cultivators. It is said to yield an oil, used in medicine and as an illuminant. The whole plant is considered to be diaphoretic and sedative. It is administered in decoction in malarious fever. The root is a bitter tonic, useful in cancer and in strumous diseases. The leaves are poisonous to cattle.

xānth-thō-, pref. [Gr. xanthos=yellow.] Yellow, the meaning amplified by the succeeding element or elements of a word.

fāte, fāt, fāre, amidst, whāt, fāll, father; wē, wēt, hēre, camēl, hēr, thēre; pīne, pīt, sīre, sīr, marīne; gō, pōt, or, wōre, wōlf, wōrk, whō, sōn; mūte, cūb, cūre, unite, cūr, rōle, fūll; trȳ, Sȳrian. æ, œ = ē; ey = ā. qu = kw.

xân'-thô, s. [Gr. xanthos=yellow.]

Zoöl.: A genus of Canceridæ, with many species. Carapace very wide, not particularly convex; front generally advanced, lamellar, divided by a narrow fissure into two lobes, with their borders notched in the middle; anterior feet generally unequal in the male; abdomen with seven segments in the female, and, as a rule, five in the male.

xân-thô-bê'-tîc, a. [Pref. xantho-; Mod. Latin beta=beet-root, and Eng. suff. -ic.] Derived from or contained in beet, and having a yellow color.

xanthobetic-acid, s.

Chem.: An acid extracted from the root of Beta vulgaris by cold alcohol. It is a reddish-yellow mass, very hygroscopic, has a sour taste, is soluble in water and alcohol, slightly soluble in ether.

xân-thô-car'-pous, a. [Pref. xantho-; Greek karpos=fruit, and Eng. suff. -ous.]

Bot.: Having yellow fruit.

xân-thô-chrô'-i, s. pl. [Gr. xanthochroos=with yellow skin; pref. xantho-, and Gr. chros=the skin.] Anthrop.: Fair Whites. The name applied by Huxley to a population, in early times extending from Western and Central Asia into Eastern and Central Europe, and distinguished by yellow or red hair, blue eyes and fair complexion. The farthermost limit of the Xanthochroi northward is Iceland and the British Isles; southwestward they are traceable at intervals through the Berber country, and end in the Canary Islands.

"To avoid the endless confusion produced by our present half-physical, half-philological classification, I shall use a new name, Xanthochroi, indicating that they are 'yellow' haired, and 'pale' in complexion."—Huxley: Critiques, p. 149.

xân-thô-chrô'-ic, a. [Mod. Latin xanthochroi (q. v.); Eng. suff. -ic.] Having a fair skin; of or belonging to the Xanthochroi (q. v.).

"If any one should think fit to assume that in the year 100 B. C. there was one continuous Xanthochroic population from the Rhine to the Yenesei, and from the Ural mountains to the Hindoo Koosh, I know not that any evidence exists by which that position could be upset, while the existing state of things is rather in its favor than otherwise."—Huxley: Critiques, p. 150.

xân-thô-chý'-müs, s. [Pref. xantho-, and Greek chymos=juice, liquid. So named from the yellow juice exuding from their trunks.]

Botany.: A genus of Garciniæ (q. v.). Trees with thick, opposite leaves; five sepals; five petals; five bundles of stamens, alternating with five large glands; a five-celled ovary; a fruit with five or fewer cells. Known species three, from tropical Asia. Xanthochymus pictorius (= Garcinia xanthochymus) occurs in the mountains of Southern India. It has a bright yellow, pleasant-tasted fruit of about the size of an apricot. The juice of the tree furnishes an inferior kind of gamboge.

xân-thô-cône, xân-thôc'-ô-nite, subst. [Pref. xantho-, and Gr. konis=powder; Ger. xanthokon.]

Min.: A very rare mineral occurring only in small crystals and reniform groups associated with stephanite, proustite, &c. Crystallization, rhombohedral. Hardness, 2.0; specific gravity, 5.0-5.2; color, dull red, clove-brown, orange-yellow; brittle. Composition: Sulphur, 21.1; arsenic, 14.9; silver, 64.0=100, whence the formula $(3AgS + As_2S_3) + 2(3AgS + As_2S_3)$.

xân-thô-gên, xân-thô-gêne, s. [Pref. xantho-, and Gr. gennaô=to engender, to produce.]

Chem.: Hope's name for a light-yellow non-crystalline substance found in flowers, and supposed to be widely distributed throughout the Vegetable Kingdom. It is soluble in water, alcohol, and ether, and is turned yellow on the addition of an alkali. Clamor-Marquart called the same substance Resin of Flowers.

xân-thôl'-çin, s. [Formed from Gr. xanthos=yellow.]

Chem.: A yellow coloring matter found in the seed-capsules of Sorghum saccharatum.

xân-thô-lein, s. [Formed from Gr. xanthos=yellow.]

Chem.: A yellow coloring matter obtained from the bark of Sorghum saccharatum. (Watts.)

xân-thô-lîte, s. [XANTHOLITES.]

Min.: The same as STAUROLITE (q. v.).

xân-thô-lî-tēs, s. [Pref. xantho-, and Gr. lithos=a stone.]

Palæont.: A genus of Crustacea, with one species, found in the London clay. (Etheridge.)

xân-thôn'-ýx, s. [Pref. xantho-, and Gr. onyx=a claw.]

Zoöl.: A genus of Helicidæ, with three species, from Mexico. Akin to Vitrina (q. v.), from which it has been separated.

xân-thô-phê'-nîc, a. [Pref. xantho-, and Eng. phenic.] Containing or derived from phenyl, and yellow in color.

xanthophenic-acid, s.

Chem.: A yellow coloring matter, of unknown composition, obtained by heating phenol or cresol with arsenic acid. It dissolves in water with a golden-yellow color, and in alkalies with a red color, and dyes silk and wool yellow without the aid of mordants.

xân'-thô-phýll, s. [Pref. xantho-, and Gr. phyllo=a leaf.] [CHLOROPHYLL.]

Chem.: The yellow coloring matter of withered leaves. Nothing certain is known respecting its composition, or of the manner in which it is formed from chlorophyll. (Watts.)

xân-thô-phýl'-line, subst. [Eng. xanthophyll; suff. -ine.]

Chem.: The same as XANTHOPHYLL (q. v.).

xân-thô-phýll'-ite, s. [Pref. xantho-, and Gr. phyllo=a leaf; suff. -ite (Min.).]

Min.: A variety of Seybertite (q. v.) occurring in globular groups of tabular crystals at the Schischinsk Mountains, Slatoust, Orenburg, Russia.

xân-thô-prô-tē'-ic, adj. [Eng. xanthoprotein; -ic.] Yellow in color, and containing or derived from protein.

xanthoproteic-acid, s.

Chem.: $C_{34}H_{26}N_4O_{14}$ (?). Xanthoprotein. A dibasic acid, obtained by the action of nitric acid on albumin, fibrin, casein, and horny matters. It is an orange-yellow amorphous powder, tasteless, inodorous, insoluble in water and alcohol, but forming deep red solutions with aqueous alkalies.

xân-thô-prô-tē'-in, s. [Pref. xantho-, and Eng. protein.]

Chem.: Xanthoproteic-acid (q. v.).

xân-thôp'-sis, s. [Mod. Lat. xantho-, and Gr. opsis=aspect.]

Palæont.: A genus of Crustaceans. Four or five species are known from the London Clay. (Etheridge.)

xân-thô-pý-rî-tēs, s. [Pref. xantho-, and Eng. pyrites.]

Min.: The same as PYRITES (q. v.).

xân-thô-rhâm'-nîn, s. [Pref. xantho-, and Eng. rhamnine.]

Chem.: $C_{23}H_{28}O_{14}$ (?). A yellow coloring matter, obtained by boiling coarsely-ground Persian berries with alcohol, filtering, and allowing the filtrate to crystallize. It forms tufts of pale-yellow shining crystals, soluble in water and alcohol, insoluble in ether.

xân-thôr-rhî'-za, subst. [Pref. xantho-, and Gr. rhiza=a root.]

Bot.: A genus of Ranunculaceæ, tribe Actææ. Sepals five, deciduous; petals five, much smaller than the sepals; ovaries five to fifteen, each with two or three ovules; follicles usually by abortion one-seeded. Xanthorrhiza apifolia, an undershrub, is one of the plants called in America Yellowroot. Its root, pith, and the inner layers of wood are bright yellow, and were used by the American Indians as a yellow dye. It yields both a gum and a resin, both of them intensely bitter, as are the wood and bark. It is prescribed as a tonic.

xân-thôr-rhê'-a, subst. [Pref. xantho-, and Gr. rhêô=to flow. Named from the yellow juice flowing from them. (See def.)]

Bot.: A genus of Liliaceæ, tribe Aphyllanthæ. Plants botanically of the Lily type, but with longer or shorter arborescent trunks, formed by the bases of leaves glued together with the resin which has exuded from the plant; wiry grass-like pendulous leaves, in a clump at the top of the stem, so as to partly resemble a palm tree. Flowers in a close, scaly spike, the perianth six-cleft, the stamens six, exserted; the fruit a woody, three-celled capsule with a few black seeds. They constitute the Grass Trees of Australia, which, from their often being blackened outside by bush fires, are popularly called also Black Boys. They occur in Australia and Tasmania. Their young leaves are eaten. Xanthorrhæa humilis, the Dwarf Grass-tree, being the species most commonly employed. X. arborea exudes a fragrant resin, smelling like benzoin, and called Botany Bay gum. X. hastilis, according to De Candolle, though an endogen, has an approach to medullary rays. [GRASS-TREE.]

xanthorrhæa-resin, s. [ACAROÏD-RESIN.]

xân-thôr'-thite, subst. [Pref. xantho-, and Eng. orthite (Min.).]

Min.: An altered variety of Allanite (q. v.) containing much water. Color, yellowish.

xân-thô'-şî'-a, s. [XANTHOSIS.]

Palæont.: A genus of Malacostraca. Two species are known from the Upper Greensand of England.

xân-thô-sî-dêr'-ite, s. [Pref. xantho-, and Eng. siderite (Min.).]

Mineralogy.: 1. A mineral occurring in stellate and concentric aggregates of fine fibers, sometimes ochreous.

Hardness of fibers, 2.5; luster, silky, sometimes earthy; color, brownish-yellow to brownish-red; in earthy forms, colors various. Composition: Sesquioxide of iron, 81.6; water, 18.4=100, whence the formula $Fe_2O_3 \cdot 2H_2O$.

2. The same as COPIAPITE (q. v.).

xân-thô'-şîs, s. [Mod. Lat. from Gr. xanthos=yellow.]

Pathol.: Yellow discoloration in a cancerous tumor.

xân-thô-sô'-ma, s. [Pref. xantho-, and Gr. sōma=body. Named from the yellow stigmas.]

Bot.: A genus of Caladiæ (q. v.). West Indian Aroid plants with erect rootstocks, sagittate leaves, and flowers in a spadix of both sexes. The rootstock of Xanthosoma sagittifolia furnishes starch.

xân-thô-spêr'-mous, a. [Pref. xantho-, Greek sperma=seed, and Eng. suff. -ous.]

Bot.: Having yellow seeds.

xân-thô-tân'-nîc, adj. [Pref. xantho-, and Eng. tannic.] Yellow, and containing or derived from tannin.

xanthotannic-acid, s.

Chem.: The name given by Ferrein to the yellow coloring matter of elm-leaves, extracted by alcohol.

xân-thô-ûir'-a, s. [Pref. xantho-, and Gr. oura=the tail.]

Ornith.: A genus of Corvidæ, founded by Bonaparte, with three species, ranging from equatorial America northward to Mexico and Texas. Head without crest, bill very stout, rather higher than broad, culmen curved from base; nostrils rather small, oval, concealed by nasal tuft; tail longer than wings, graduated; wings concave, rounded; legs very stout.

xân'-thous, a. [From Gr. xanthos=yellow.]

Ethnol.: A term applied by Prichard to his yellow-haired variety of the human race, characterized by hair of a reddish, yellowish, or flaxen color, the iris of the eye of a light hue, generally blue or gray. Typical example, the tribes or individuals of pure Germanic descent.

xân-thôx'-ýl, s. [XANTHOXYLON.]

Bot. (pl.): The order Xanthoxylaceæ (q. v.). (Lindley.)

xân-thôx'-ý-lâ'-çê'-æ, subst. pl. [Mod. Lat. xanthoxyl(on); Lat. fem. pl. adj. suff. -aceæ.]

Bot.: Xanthoxyls; an order of Hypogynous Exogens, alliance Rutales. Aromatic or pungent trees or shrubs; leaves abruptly or unequally pinnate, more rarely simple, with pellucid dots; stipules wanting; flowers axillary or terminal, often unisexual; sepals four or five, rarely three; petals generally the same number as the sepals, rarely wanting; stamens equal in number to or twice as many as the petals. Fruit berried or membranous, with two to five cells, sometimes of several drupes, or two-valved capsules; seeds one or two, pedulous. Natives of tropical America, India, China, Africa, &c. Known genera twenty, species 110. (Lindley.)

xân-thôx'-ý-lêne, s. [Mod. Lat. xanthoxyl(on); -ene.]

Chem.: $C_{10}H_{16}$. The volatile oil of Xanthoxylon piperitum (Japan Pepper), first extracted by Stenhouse. It is colorless, possesses an aromatic odor, and boils at 162°.

xân-thôx'-ý-lîn, subst. [Mod. Latin xanthoxyl(on); -in.]

Chem.: The camphor obtained by distilling the bruised seeds of Xanthoxylon piperitum with water. It forms monoclinic crystals, with a milky luster; insoluble in water, soluble in alcohol and ether, melts at 80°, and distills without decomposition.

xân-thôx'-ý-lôn, xân-thôx'-ý-lûm, s. [Pref. xantho-, and Gr. xylon=wood. So named because the roots of the species are yellow.]

Bot.: The typical genus of Xanthoxylaceæ (q. v.). Trees, erect or climbing shrubs, often prickly. Leaves compound, pinnate, trifoliate, with the leaflets reduced to one, usually with pellucid dots. Flowers small, unisexual, in axillary or terminal panicles. Sepals five, four, or three; petals and stamens as many; carpels, one to five; fruit splitting in two, with one or two shining black seeds. A large genus, found both in the eastern and western hemispheres, especially in their warmer parts. They are so aromatic and pungent that in the countries where they exist they are popularly called peppers, specially Xanthoxylum piperitum, called Japan Pepper. X. rhetsa, an Indian species, has small yellow flowers and small round berries, which, when unripe, taste like the skin of a fresh orange. Its fruit, and the seeds and bark of X. alatum, which grows near the base of the Himalayas, and those of X. budrunga, also Indian, are given as aromatic tonics in fever, diarrhoea, dysentery, and cholera. The small branches are employed to bôil, bôy; pout, jowl; cat, çell, chorus, çhin, bench; go, gem; thin, çhis; sin, aş; expect, Xenophon, exist. ph = f. -cian, -tian = şan. -tion, -sion = şûn; -çion, -şion = zhûn. -tious, -cious, -sious = şûs. -ble, -dle, &c. = bel, del.

make warking-sticks, and the twigs as tooth-brushes. The seeds of X. budrunga are as fragrant as lemon-peel; X. clava and X. fraxineum [TOOTHACHE-TREE], applied externally to the gums or taken internally, are powerful sudorifics and diaphoretics used in toothache, paralysis of the muscles of the mouth, and rheumatism. The root of X. nitidum is sudorific, emmenagogue, &c.; X. caribæum is a febrifuge; X. piperitum and X. avicennæ are regarded in China and Japan as antidotes to poison. The powdered bark of X. hiemale is given in Brazil in earache; and the capsules and seeds of X. hastile are employed in Northern India to intoxicate fish. The wood of X. hiemale is very hard and suitable for building.

xān-thy'-dric, adj. [Pref. xanth-, and Eng. hydric.] Yellow in color, and having water in its composition.

xanthydric-acid, s. [PERSULPHOCYANIC-ACID.] xē'-bēc, s. [Sp. xabeque; Port. zabeco; French shebec, from Turk. sumbaki; Pers. sumbuk; Arabic sumbūk=a small boat, a pinnace; Modern Arabic shabāk; Ital. zambecco.]

Naut.: A small three-masted vessel with lateen sails, used for coasting voyages in the Mediterranean and on the ocean-coasts of Spain and Portugal.

Xebec.

It differs from the felucca in having square sails as well as lateen sails, the felucca having only lateen sails.

xē'-ma, s. [Etym. not apparent.]

Ornithology: A genus of Larinæ, with one species, Xema sabini, Sabine's Gull, from the north temperate zone. Bill rather shorter than head, moderately stout, upper mandible decurved from beyond the nostrils to the tip, gonys angulated and advancing upward; nostrils basal, lateral, linear; legs moderately long, lower part of tibiae bare for some distance; tarsi tolerably strong; three toes in front entirely palmated; hind toe small, elevated; wings long; tail distinctly forked.

xēn-, pref. [XENO-.]

xēn-ē-lā'-sī-a, s. [Gr.=expulsion of strangers.]

Greek Antiq.: An institution at Sparta, by which strangers were prohibited from residing there without permission, and under which the magistrates were empowered to expel strangers if they saw fit to do so.

xēn'-ī-a, s. [Gr. xenia=the state of a guest.]

Zoöl.: A genus of Alcyonidæ, from the Red Sea and Fiji. The polypes are non-retractile, and situated on a fasciculate and fleshy stem.

xēn'-ī-ūm (pl. xēn'-ī-a), subst. [Latin, from Greek xenion=a gift to a stranger, from xenos=a stranger.]

*1. Greek Antiq.: A present given to a guest or stranger, or to a foreign ambassador.

2. Art.: A name given to pictures of still life, fruit, &c., such as are found at Pompeii. (Fairholt.)

xēn-ō, xēn-, pref. [Gr. xenos=(s.) a guest=friend; (a.) strange, unusual.]

Nat. Science: A prefix denoting (1) likeness as distinguished from identity; (2) having some abnormal process or processes, the meaning in both cases being completed by the last element of the word.

xēn-ō-bāt'-ra-chūs, subst. [Pref. xeno-, and Gr. batrachos=a frog.]

Zoöl.: A genus of Engystomidæ, with one species, Xenobatrachus ophidion, from New Guinea.

xēn-ō-cy'-prid'-in-a, s. pl. [Mod. Lat. xenocypris, genit. xenocyprid(is); Lat. neut. pl. adj. suff. -ina.]

Ichthy.: A group of Cyprinidæ; anal rather short; dorsal short, with a bony ray, lateral line running along the middle of the tail. There are three genera: Xenocypris and Paracanthobrama, from China; and Mystacoleucus, from Sumatra.

xēn-ō-cy'-pris, s. [Prefix xeno-, and Mod. Lat. cypris=Lat. cyprinus (q. v.).] [XENOCYPRIDINA.]

xēn-ō-dērm'-ich'-thys, subst. [Pref. xeno-; Gr. derma=skin, and ichthys=a fish.]

Ichthy.: A genus placed in the family Alepocephalidæ, allied to Alepocephalus (q. v.), the only species known before the voyage of the Challenger. It is a deep-sea fish, found at about 345 fathoms, and having fine nodules instead of scales. (Günther.)

xēn-ō-dō-chē'-ūm, xēn-ō-dō-chī'-ūm, subst. [Gr. xenodocheion, from xenos=a stranger, and dechomai=to receive.]

Gr. Antiq.: A name given to a building for the reception of strangers; also applied to a guest-house in a monastery.

xēn-ōd'-ō-chy, s. [XENODOCHEUM.]

1. Reception of strangers; hospitality.

2. The same as XENODOCHEUM (q. v.).

xēn-ō-gēn'-ē-sis, s. [Pref. xeno-, and Gr. genesis=origin, source.]

Biol.: A term introduced by M. Milne Edwards to designate that form of biogenesis in which the living parent was supposed to give rise to offspring which passed through a totally different series of states from those exhibited by the parent and did not return into the cycle of the parent. Professor Huxley remarks that the proper term for this would be heterogenesis, but that unfortunately this term has been employed in a different sense; and after showing that there are analogies both for and against xenogenesis, decides against its known existence. The nearest approach to it is not, as was once believed, in tapeworms, the history of whose transformations has been traced, but in tumors and corns on the animal body or galls on the vegetable leaves or other organs. (Prof. Huxley: Presidential Address, Brit. Assoc. Rep., 1870.)

xēn-ō-gē-nēt'-ic, a. [Pref. xeno-, and English genetic.] Of, pertaining to, or produced by xenogenesis.

"I have dwelt upon the analogy of pathological modification which is in favor of the xenogenetic origin of microzymes."—Huxley: Presidential Address, Brit. Assoc. Rep. for 1870, p. lxxxv.

xēn'-ō-lite, s. [Pref. xeno-, and Gr. lithos=a stone; Ger. xenolith.]

Min.: A variety of Fibrolite (q. v.), possessing a high specific gravity, suggesting a relationship to Kyanite (q. v.); but its optical properties are similar to those of Fibrolite.

xēn-ō-neūr'-a, s. [Pref. xeno-, and Gr. neuron=a tendon.]

Palæont.: A genus of Neuroptera, having attached to its wing the remains of a stridulating organ like that of the grasshoppers. Found in the Devonian of North America.

xēn-ō-pēl'-tī-dæ, s. pl. [Mod. Lat. xenopeltis]; Lat. fem. pl. adj. suff. -idæ.] [XENOPELTIS.]

xēn-ō-pēl'-tīs, s. [Pref. xeno-, and Gr. peltē=a shield.]

Zoöl.: A genus of Tortricidæ, often raised to the rank of a family (Xenopeltidæ). Head depressed; upper jaw produced beyond lower; teeth setaceous; no spurs at vent. There is but one species, Xenopeltis unicolor (= Tortrix xenopeltis), a curious nocturnal carnivorous snake, ranging from Penang to Cambodia, and through the Malay Islands to Celebes.

xēn-ō-phry's, s. [Pref. xen-, and Gr. ophrys=an eyebrow.]

Zoöl.: A genus of Pelobatidæ (q. v.), with one species, Xenophrys monticola, from the mountains of India.

xēn'-ōps, s. [Pref. xen-, and Gr. ops=the eye, the face.]

Ornith.: A genus of Dendrocolaptidæ, with three species, from tropical America. The lower mandible is graduated upward, while the upper is quite straight.

xēn-ōp'-tēr-ūs, s. [Pref. xeno-, and Gr. pteron=a wing, a fin.]

Ichthy.: A genus of Tetradontina, or a sub-genus of Tetrodon, from the Indian Archipelago. The species are distinguished by their funnel-shaped nostrils, and the small dermal ossifications which have two or three roots and form spines over the skin.

xēn'-ō-pūs, s. [Pref. xeno-, and Gr. pous=a foot.]

Zoöl.: A genus of Aglossa, family Dactylethridæ, with three species, from tropical Africa.

xēn-ō-rhī'-nā, s. [Pref. xeno-, and rhis (genit. rhinos)=the snout.]

Zoöl.: A genus of Anura, with one species, Xenorhina oxycephala, from New Guinea. Ears perfect, tongue free in front. By some authors raised to the rank of a family, by others merged in Engystomidæ.

xēn'-ōs, s. [Gr. xenos=a guest, a stranger.]

Entom.: A genus of Stylopidae. A species discovered by Rossi parasitic on a wasp, Polistes gallica, led to the establishment of the order Strepsiptera.

xēn'-ō-time, s. [Beudant, who named it, gives the etymology as Gr. kenos=vain, empty, and timē=honor; but, as Dana suggests, the word being misspelled from the first, the derivation should be accepted as xenos=a stranger to, and timē=honor.]

Min.: A tetragonal mineral occurring mostly in crystals. Hardness, 4-5; specific gravity, 4.45-4.56; luster, resinous; color, shades of brown, reddish, yellowish; opaque. Composition: Phosphoric acid, 37.86; yttria, 62.14=100, yielding the formula 3YOPO₅.

xēn-ūr'-ūs, s. [Pref. xen-, and Gr. oura=a tail.]

1. Zoöl.: A genus of Dasypodidæ, with three species ranging from Guiana to Paraguay.

2. Palæont.: Remains have been found in the Post-Pliocene Caves of Brazil.

xēn'-yl, subst. [Greek xenos=a stranger; -yl.] [DIPHENYL.]

xēn-yl'-a-mīne, s. [Eng. xenyl, and amine.]

Chem.: C₁₂H₁₁N. Martylamine. A crystalline body found in the basic oil which is obtained as a by-product in the manufacture of aniline. It forms white shining scales, slightly soluble in water, soluble in alcohol and ether, melts at 45°, boils at 320°, and distills without decomposition.

xēn-yl'-lēn'-ic, a. [Eng. xenyl; -en, -ic.] Pertaining to or containing xenyl (q. v.).

xenyleneic-alcohol, s.

Chem.: C₁₂H₁₀O₂= $\left(\text{C}_{12}\text{H}_9\right)''\text{O}_2$. Diphenyl-alcohol. Diphenylic acid. A diatomic alcohol obtained by the action of water on diazobenzidine nitrate. It crystallizes in small white needles, slightly soluble in water, soluble in alcohol and ether, and melts when heated. It dissolves readily in potash and in strong ammonia.

xēr-ān-thēm'-ē-æ, s. pl. [Mod. Latin xeranthemum]; Lat. fem. pl. adj. suff. -æ.]

Bot.: A sub-tribe of Compositæ, tribe Cynareæ. Heads many-flowered, discoid, the marginal flowers feminine, the others hermaphrodite.

xēr-ān-thē-mūm, subst. [Gr. xēros=dry, and anthos=a flower.]

Bot.: The typical genus of Xeranthemæ (q. v.). Leaves whitish and cottony beneath, the involucre imbricated, the ray colored. Composites of the kind called "Everlasting Flowers" from Continental Europe and the Levant.

xē-rā'-sī-a, s. [Gr. xerasia=dryness.]

Pathol.: A species of Alopecia, characterized by the dryness and powdery appearance of the hairs which are generally split at the tops.

xēr-ē'-nē, s. [ZERENE.]

xēr'-ēs, s. [Sp.] Sherry. So called from the district of Spain where it is produced. [SHERRY.]

xēr'-īf, s. [SHEREEF.]

xēr'-īf', s. [Turk.]

1. A gold coin formerly current in Egypt and Turkey, value 9s. 4d, or about $2.25.

2. A name for the ducat in Morocco.

xēr-ō-cōl-lŷr'-ī-ūm, s. [Greek xēros=dry, and kollyrion=an eye-salve.] A dry collyrium or eye-salve.

xēr-ō-dēr'-ma, s. [Pref. xero-, and Gr. derma=skin.]

Pathol.: Dryness of the skin.

xēr-ō-dēs, subst. [Gr., from xēros=dry.] Any tumor attended with dryness.

xēr'-ō-myr-ūm (yr as ir), s. [Gr. xēros=dry, and myron=an ointment.] A dry ointment.

xēr-ōph'-a-gŷ, s. [Gr. xēros=dry, and phagein=to eat.] A term applied by early ecclesiastical writers to the Christian rule of fasting; the act or habit of living on dry food or a meager diet.

"Xerophagy, i. e., eating food not moistened by flesh broth, juicy fruit, or vinous ingredient, was distinctly new."—Smith: Dict. Christ. Biog., iv. 857.

xēr'-ōph-thāl-mŷ, xēr'-ōph-thāl'-mī-a, subst. [Lat. xerophthalmia, from Greek xerophthalmia: xēros=dry, and ophthalmos=the eye.]

Pathol.: A dry, red soreness, attended by itching of the eye, without swelling or discharge of humors.

xēr'-ō-site, s. [Gr. xēros=withered, decayed; suff. -ite (Petrol.).]

Petrol.: A name given by Haüy to a decomposed porphyritic diorite.

xēr'-ō-tēs, s. [Gr. xērotēs=dryness.]

Pathol.: A dry habit or disposition of the body.

xēr'-ūs, s. [Gr. xēros=withered, haggard.]

Zoöl.: A genus of Sciurinae, with a few species, from Africa, where they burrow in the ground or among the roots of trees or bushes. There are two pairs of pectoral teats; tail comparatively short;

fāte, fāt, fāre, amidst, whāt, fāl, father; wē, wēt, hēre, camēl, hēr, thēre; pine, pīt, sīre, sīr, marine; gō, pōt, or. wōre, wōlf, wōrk, whō, sōn; mūte, cūb, cūre, unite, cūr, rūle, fūll; trŷ, Sŷrian. æ, œ = ē; ey = ā. qu = kw.

fur mixed with flattened spines. The best known species, Xerus rutilans, is about twenty inches long, of which the tail forms nine; reddish-yellow above, paler on sides, whitish below.

xī-mě'n'-ī-a, s. [Named after Francis Ximenes, a Spanish monk, who wrote a work upon Mexican plants in 1615.]

Bot.: A genus of Olacaceæ, with three or four known species. Large shrubs or small trees, often spinous. Leaves entire, leathery; calyx very small, petals four, hairy inside; stamens eight, ovary with four cells, each one-seeded. Ximenia americana, the False Sandal-wood, is a straggling Indian shrub, producing dull-white fragrant flowers, smelling like cloves, succeeded by small, oval, red or yellow pulpy fruits, an inch long, aromatic, but somewhat austere. They are eaten by the Hindus, and by the natives of Senegal. The kernels taste like filberts.

xīph'-ī-ās, s. [Lat., from Gr. xiphias=as adj., sword-shaped; as subst., a sword-fish.]

1. Ichthy.: A genus of Xiphiidæ (q. v.), distinguished by the absence of ventral fins. The best known species is Xiphias gladius, the Common, or Mediterranean Sword-fish. Günther says that the distinction of species is beset with great difficulties, owing to the fact that but few specimens exist in museums, and because the form of the dorsal, the length of the ventrals, and the shape and length of the sword appear to change according to the age.

2. Astronomy:

(1) [DORADO, II. 1.]

(2) A comet shaped like a sword.

xī-phīd'-ī-ōn, s. [Gr. xiphidion=a small sword, dimin. from xiphos=a sword.]

Ichthy.: A genus of Blenniidae, from the Pacific coast of North America. Allied to Centronotus (q. v.).

xī-phīd'-ī-ūm, s. [XIPHIDION.]

Botany: A genus of Wachendorfeæ. Liliaceous plants from South America. Simple stems, ensiform leaves, and somewhat secund nodding panicles of blue or white flowers.

xī-phī'-ī-dæ, s. pl. [Mod. Lat. xiphi(as); Lat. fem. pl. adj. suff. -idæ.]

1. Ichthy.: The sole family of the Acanthopterygian division. Xiphiiformes (q. v.), with two genera, Histiophorus and Xiphias (q. v.). The upper jaw is produced into a long cuneiform weapon.

2. Palæont.: From the Chalk and the London Clay of Sheppey.

xīph'-ī-for'-mēs, s. pl. [Mod. Lat., from Latin xiphias=a sword-fish, and forma=form, appearance.]

Ichthy.: A division of Acanthopterygian Fishes, with a single family, Xiphiidae (q. v.).

xīph'-ī-stēr'-nūm, s. [Gr. xiphos=a sword, and sternon=the breast.]

Compar. Anat.: The metasternum or ensiform process of the sternum; corresponding with the xiphoid cartilage in man.

xīph-ō, pref. [Gr. xiphos=a sword.] Sword-shaped; having a sword-shaped process or processes.

xīph-ō-cō-lāp'-tēs, s. [Pref. xipho-, and Greek kolaptēs=a chisel.]

Ornith.: A sub-genus of Dendrocolaptes, with five species ranging from Mexico to Bolivia. The sub-genus was established by Leeson for those species which have the bill bent.

xīph'-ō-dōn, subst. [Pref. xipho-, and Gr. odontos=a tooth.]

Palæontology: The type-genus of Xiphodontidae (q. v.), from the Eocene. The species were small, two-toed mammals, with a short tail, and long, slender limbs. Dentition complete; molars of a generalized selenodont type.

xīph-ō-dōn'-tī-dæ, s. pl. [Mod. Lat. xiphodon, genit. xiphodont(is); Lat. fem. pl. adj. suff. -idæ.]

Palæont.: A family of Artiodactyle Ungulates, with three genera, Xiphodon, Cainotherium, and Microtherium, from the Eocene and Miocene of France. The species were probably intermediate between the Suidæ and the Tragulidæ.

xīph-ō-gād'-ūs, s. [Pref. xipho-, and Mod. Lat. gādus.]

Ichthy.: A genus of Ophidiidae (q. v.), with a single species, confined to the East Indies. Body naked; a pair of canines developed in both jaws.

xīph-ō-gor'-gī-a, subst. [Pref. xipho-, and Gr. gorgeios=of or belonging to the Gorgon.]

Zoöl.: A genus of Gorgonidae, from the warmer seas. The polypes form straight, sword-shaped masses.

xīph'-ōīd, a. [Gr. xiphos=a sword, and eidos=form, appearance.] Resembling a sword; shaped like a sword; ensiform.

xiphoid-cartilage, s. [ENSIFORM-CARTILAGE.]

xīph-ōīd'-ī-an, a. [XIPHOID.] Of or pertaining to the xiphoid cartilage.

xīph-ōph'-yī-loūs, adj. [Pref. -xipho-, and Gr. phyllon=a leaf.]

Bot.: Having ensiform leaves.

xīph-ōp'-tēr-ūs, s. [Pref. -xipho-, and Gr. pteron=a wing, a fin.]

Palæont.: A genus of Trichiuridae, of Eocene age.

xīph-ō-sūr'-a, s. pl. [Gr. xiphos=a sword, and oura=a tail.]

1. Zoöl.: An order or sub-order of Merostomata (q. v.): Anterior segments welded together to form a broad, convex buckler, upon the dorsal surface of which are placed the compound eyes and ocelli, the latter in the center, the former nearly so. Mouth furnished with a small labrum, a rudimentary metastoma, and six pairs of appendages. Posterior segments more or less free, having on their ventral surfaces a series of broad, lamellar appendages; telson ensiform. Only one recent genus, Limulus (q. v.).

2. Palæont.: Fossil genera numerous, from the Upper Silurian to the Tertiary. [See extract under XIPHOSURAN.]

xīph'-ō-sūr'-an, s. [XIPHOSURA.] Any individual of the Xiphosura (q. v.).

"In the Devonian no certain traces of Xiphosurans have yet been detected, but several types occur in the Carboniferous."—Nicholson: Palæont., I. 385.

xīph'-ō-teū'-thīs, s. [Pref. xipho-, and Mod. Lat. teuthis (q. v.).]

Palæont.: A genus of Belemnitidae, with one species from the Lias. Shell with a long phragmacone, enveloped in a calcareous sheath.

xī-phy'd'-rī-a, s. [Gr. xiphydrion, dimin. from xiphos=a sword, . . . a mussel-shell.]

Entom.: A genus of Uroceridae (q. v.). Antennæ short, head round, neck long, maxillary palpi with five joints; larva boring into the wood of the beech, the oak, the poplar, the willow, &c. The typical species is Xiphydria camelus. It is black, with white spots on the top of the head and along the sides of the abdomen, and red legs. Length, about half an inch.

xōn-āit'-īte, s. [After Tetela de Xonalta, Mexico, where found; suff. -ite (Min.).]

Min.: A massive mineral found associated with apophyllite and bustamite. Specific gravity, 2.71; color, white to gray; tough. Composition: Silica, 49.80; lime, 46.47; water, 3.73=100, equivalent to the formula 4CaOSiO₂+H₂O.

xū-lī-nōs-pri-ō-nī'-tēs, subst. [Greek xylinos=wooden; priōn=a saw, and suff. -ites.]

Palæobot.: A genus of fruits with valveless, woody, two-seeded legumes. The pericarp unites in a singular manner the characters of a legume and a drupe. Two species are known. Xulinosprionites latus has the legume short and broad, with the apex umbonate, the epicarp rugose and mammillated, the sarcocarp thin, and the endocarp thick. X. zingiberiformis has the legume lomentaceous, irregular; the epicarp somewhat coriaceous, the sarcocarp pithy, the cells very large, the endocarp thick. Externally it looks like a piece of ginger-root, and it is not till it is fractured that it is found to be a legume. Both species are from the London Clay of Sheppey. [Bowerbank: Fossil Fruits.]

xy-lān'-thrax, s. [Prefix xyl(o)-, and Greek anthrax=coal or charcoal.]

Petrol.: Wood coal or charcoal, in distinction from mineral coal.

xy-lār'-ī-a, subst. [Fem. of Mod. Lat. xylarius=growing in woods, from Gr. xylon=wood.]

Bot.: A genus of Sphæriaceæ. Branched, horny, or fleshy fungals, often with clavate lobes, whitish and mealy when young, afterward brown or black. Perithecia horny, usually immersed all over the branches; center black, composed of asci, with eight usually uniseptate spores. The largest species are tropical, but several are found in Europe on rotten wood, stumps of trees, &c. The most common is Xylaria hypoxylon.

xy'-lēm, s. [Gr. xylē=timber.]

Bot.: Naegli's name for one or two groups into which the permanent tissues of a fibro-vascular bundle can be divided. It is composed of parenchymatous cells, wood fibers, vascular cells, and true vessels, in which the walls of the cells generally become ligneous. From it the wood is developed.

xylem-parenchyma, s.

Bot.: The medullary rays. (Thomé.)

xy'-lēne, s. [Gr. xylon=wood; suff. -ene.]

Chem.: C₈H₁₀=C₆H₄(CH₃)₂. Dimethyl-benzene. A colorless, volatile liquid found in that portion of light coal-tar oil which distills over between 136° and 141°. It admits of three isomeric modifications, depending on the relative position of the two methyl atoms; viz., orthoxylene, prepared synthetically by the action of sodium on a mixture of orthobromotoluene and methylic iodide, boils at 140-141°; metaxylene, obtained by distilling xylic or mesitylenic acid with lime, boils at 137°; and paraxylene, prepared by the action of sodium on bromotoluene and methylic iodide, boils at 136-137°. On passing xylene through a red-hot tube, it is resolved into benzene, toluene, and other hydrocarbons.

xylene-diamine, s. [XYLYLENE-DIAMINE.]

xylene-sulphochloride, s.

Chem.: C₈H₉SClO₂=C₆H₃(CH₃)₂SO₂Cl. A yellow oil obtained by triturating xylene-sulphate of sodium with phosphorus pentachloride, warming the mixture, and pouring the product into water.

xylene-sulphuric acid, s.

Chem.: C₈H₁₀SO₃=C₆H₃(CH₃)₂SO₃H. Xylosulphuric acid. Sulphoxylic acid. Produced by the action of concentrated sulphuric acid on xylene. It is very soluble in water, and by dry distillation is reconverted into xylene. With the oxides it forms salts called xylene sulphates, its potassium and sodium salts being soluble in water and alcohol, and crystallizing from the latter in silky laminæ.

xy'-lēn-ōl, s. [Formed from Gr. xylon=wood, and Eng. suff. -ol.]

Chemistry: C₈H₁₀O=C₆H₃(CH₃)₂OH. Dimethylphenol. An eight-carbon phenol, produced by fusing oxymesitylenic acid with potash. It melts at 75°, and boils at 213.5°.

xy'-lēn-yl, s. [XYLYL.]

xy'-lēn-yl'-a-mine, subst. [English xylenyl, and -amine.] [XYLIDINE.]

xy'-lēu'-tēs, s. [Gr. xyleuomai=to gather wood.]

Entom.: A genus of Zeugsteridae. Xyleutes cossus is a modern name for the Goatmoth (q. v.), better known as Cossus ligniperda.

xy'-lī-a, s. [Gr. xylon=wood.]

Botany: A genus of Eumimoseæ, having sessile, sickle-shaped, compressed, woody legumes, with partitions between the seeds. Xylia dolabriformis (= Mimosa xylocarpa of Roxburgh), the Ironwood tree of Peru and Arkan, a large deciduous tree growing in India and Burmah, yields a red resin, and oil is expressed from its seeds. The wood is very durable; it has been used in India and Burmah for railway sleepers, piles and beams of bridges, telegraph-posts, the handles of agricultural implements, boat-building, &c.

xy'-līc, adj. [Greek xylon=wood; suffix -ic.] Derived from wood.

xylic-acid, s.

Chemistry: C₃H₇O₂=CO·OH:CH₃:CH₃. Prepared from brom-metaxylene by the action of sodium and carbonic anhydride. It crystallizes in large monoclinic prisms slightly soluble in water, more so in alcohol, and melts at 126°.

xy'-līd'-a-mine, s. [XYLIDINE.]

xy'-līd'-īc, adj. [English xyl(ic); suff. -id, -ic.] Derived from wood.

xylidic-acid, s.

Chem.: C₉H₈O₄=C₆H₃(CH₃)(CO·OH)₂. Obtained by oxidizing pseudo-cumene, xylic acid, and paraxylic acid with dilute nitric acid. It forms colorless crystals, slightly soluble in water, and melts at 280° to 283°.

xy'-lī-dīne, s. [Eng. xyl(ene); suff. -id, -ine.] [XYLODIN.]

Chemistry: C₈H₁₁N=C₆H₉(NH₂). Amidoxylylene. Amidoxylyl. Xylenylamine. A base homologous with aniline, produced by the action of ammonium sulphide or stannous chloride on nitroxylene. It is a colorless liquid, heavier than water, and boiling at 215°. Heated with tin and hydrochloric acid, it solidifies on cooling to a crystalline mass, which appears to be a compound of xylidine hydrochlorate with stannous chloride.

xy'-līn-a, subst. [Lat. xylinum; Gr. xylīnon=cotton.]

Entomol.: The typical genus of Xyliniidæ (q. v.). Antennæ slightly ciliated in the male; abdomen depressed, somewhat crested; fore wings narrow, elongate, the edges nearly parallel. British species three, the Conformist, Xylina conformis, the Non-conformist, X. zinckenii, and the Gray Shoulder Knot, X. rhizolitha.

xy'-līn'-ī-dæ, s. pl. [Mod. Lat. xylīn(a); Lat. fem. pl. adj. suff. -idæ.]

Entomol.: A family of Noctuidæ. Antennæ generally simple; thorax thick; often crested anteriorly; wings folded in repose like a flattened roof. Caterpillar long, smooth, generally brilliantly colored. [SHARK-MOTH.]

xy'-līte, s. [Gr. xylon=wood; suff. -ite (Min.); Ger. xylith.]

Min.: Probably a hydrous Asbestos, according to Dana.

bōl, bōy; pōut, jōwī; cat, çell, chorus, çhin, bench; go, gem; thin, this; sin, aş; expect, Xenophon, exist. ph = f. -cian, -tian = şan. -tion, -sion = şūn;

-tion, -şion = zhūn. -tious, -cious, -sious = şūş. -ble, -dle, &c. = bēl, dēl.

xy-lō-, pref. [Gr. xylon=fire-wood, wood, timber, a tree.] Of, belonging to, or derived from wood.

xylo-quinone, s. [PHLORONE.]

xy-lō-bāl'-sā-mūm, s. [Gr. xylon=wood, and balsamon=balsam.]

1. The wood of the balsam-tree.

2. A balsam obtained by decoction of the twigs and leaves of Amyris gileadensis in water.

xy-lō-bī-ūs, s. [Pref. xylo-, and Gr. bios=life.]

Palæont.: A genus of Chilognatha, family Archiulidæ. Segments divided by cross sutures into numerous fragments. Several species occur in the Carboniferous rocks of Nova Scotia, and one in those of Scotland. The type is Xylobius sigillariae, of the Nova Scotia Coal-field, found by Sir J. W. Dawson in the hollow trunks of Sigillaria, &c. Xylobius is the earliest known representative of the Myriapoda.

xy-lō-cām'-pā, s. [Pref. xylo-, and Gr. kampē=a caterpillar.]

Entom.: A genus of Xylinidæ. The long caterpillar feeds exposed on honeysuckle in June, July, and August.

xy-lō-carp, s. [XYLOCARPUS.]

Bot.: A hard and woody fruit.

xy-lō-car'-pōūs, adj. [XYLOCARPUS.] Having fruit which becomes hard or woody.

xy-lō-car'-pūs, s. [Pref. xylo-, and Gr. karpos=fruit.]

Bot.: A genus of Trichiliæ (q. v.), now generally combined with Carapa (q. v.).

xy-lō-chlōre, s. [Pref. xylo-, and Gr. chlōros=green.]

Min.: The same as OXHAVERITE (q. v.).

xy-lō-chlōr'-ic, a. [Pref. xylo-, and Gr. chlōros=green.] (See compound.)

xylochloric-acid, s.

Chem.: Fordos' name for the green coloring matter of decayed wood. It may be extracted by chloroform.

xy-lōc'-ō-pā, s. [Gr. xylokopos=hewing or felling wood; xylon=wood, and kopē=a cutting.]

Entom.: A large genus of Scolypedes, with sharp-pointed mandibles by which they bore holes in timber. In several species the females are black, while the males are bright yellow. [CARPENTER-BEE.]

xy-lō-crŷpt'-īte, s. [Pref. xylo-; Gr. cryptos=concealed, hidden, and suff. -ite (Min.).]

Min.: The same as SCHEERERITE (q. v.).

xy-lō-dī-ūm, s. [Gr. xyldēs=hard as wood, woody; pref. xylo-, and Gr. eidos=form.]

Bot.: An Achenium (q. v.).

xy-lō-graph, s. [Gr. xylon=wood, and graphō=to write, to draw.] An engraving on wood, or an impression from such an engraving.

"Some of the xylographs of the first edition of the Biblia Pauperum."—Saturday Review, March 29, 1884, p. 420.

xy-lōg'-rā-phēr, s. [Eng. xylograph; -er.] One who engraves on wood.

"A paper was read by Mr. George Clulow, xylographer."—Athenæum, May 17, 1884, p. 634.

xy-lō-grāph'-ic, xy-lō-grāph'-ic-al, a. [Eng. xylograph; -ic, -ical.] Pertaining or relating to xylography (q. v.).

xy-lōg'-rā-phŷ, s. [Eng. xylograph; -y.]

1. A mode of printing or graining from the natural surface of the wood. A piece of wood is selected of fine quality, having the pattern of grain desired. The surface is treated chemically to open the pores. After it is dry the surface is painted and a sized sheet of paper laid over the board, and both run together between rollers in the manner of copperplate printing. The paint is then transferred to the board, the difference in the absorbent qualities of the board determining the depth of color. The paper is laid face downward on the article to be ornamented, and rubbed on the back with a soft pad to transfer the impression.

2. A name given to a process of decorative painting on wood. A selected pattern or design is drawn on wood, which is then engraved, or the design is reproduced in zinc by the ordinary method. An electrotype cast is taken from the woodcut or zinc plate, and smooth surfaces of wood are printed from the stereotype under regulated pressure with pigments prepared for the purpose. The color penetrates the wood, leaving no outside film, and after being French-polished, or covered with a fluid enamel, the wood may be rubbed, scrubbed, or even sand-papered without destroying the pattern. (Ure.)

xy-lō'-īd, s. [XYLOIDIN.]

Chem.: Löwig's name for the radicle xylyl, C_8H_9 .

xy-lō'id, a. [XYLOIDIN.] Having the nature of wood; resembling wood.

xy-lō'-ī-din, s. [Greek xylon, and eidos=form, appearance.]

Chemistry: $C_6H_9NO_7 = C_6H_9(NO_2)_5$. Pyroxam. Nitramidin. Explosive starch. An explosive compound, discovered by Braconnot in 1833, and prepared by triturating starch with fuming nitric acid till it is reduced to a semi-fluid mass, and adding twenty-five parts of water. It is a white, inodorous, and tasteless powder, insoluble in water, alcohol, ether, and chloroform, slightly soluble in glacial acetic acid. When struck with a hammer it detonates, melts when heated, and bursts into flame at 180° , leaving a carbonaceous residue. 100 parts of starch yield 130 parts of xyloidin.

xy-lō'-ī-dine, s. [XYLOIDIN.]

Chem.: The same as XYLOIDINE (q. v.).

xy-lō'l, s. [Gr. xylon=wood; suff. -ol.] [XYLENE.]

xy-lō'l-sŭl-phŭr'-ic, a. [Pref. xylo-, and Eng. sulphuric.] Derived from or containing xylene and sulphuric acid.

xyloisulphuric-acid, s. [XYLENE-SULPHURIC ACID.]

xy-lō-mē'-lŭm, s. [Pref. xylo-, and Gr. mēlon=an apple.]

Bot.: A genus of Grevillidæ (q. v.). Australian trees, with opposite leaves, axillary spikes of flowers, and very thick, woody fruit, inversely pear-shaped. One species, Xylomelum pyriforme, is cultivated in greenhouses.

xy-lō-pāl, s. [Pref. xyl(o)-, and Eng. opal.]

Min.: The same as WOOD-OPAL (q. v.).

xy-lō'-pē-æ, s. pl. [Mod. Lat. xylop(ia); Latin fem. pl. adj. suff. -eæ.]

Bot.: A tribe of Anonacæ; stamens indefinite in number; ovules, few or many, inserted in the ventral suture of the fruit.

xy-lōph'-ā-gā, s. [Pref. xylo-, and Gr. phagein=to eat.]

1. Entomology (as a plural):

(1) A section of Securifera, including those Sawflies the larvae of which burrow in the woody portions of plants instead of eating the leaves. [SIRICIDÆ, UROCIDÆ.]

(2) A sub-tribe of Rhynchophora, comprehending those weevils which, both in their immature and in their perfect state, bore into the solid wood of trees.

2. Zoöl.: A genus of Pholadidæ (q. v.), with two species, from Norway, Britain, and South America. Shell globular, with a transverse furrow; anterior margin reflected, covered by two accessory valves within which the animal is included, except the contractile siphons. The species burrow in floating wood and in timbers which are always covered by the sea.

xy-lōph'-ā-gan, s. [XYLOPHAGA.] Any animal of the group Xylophaga.

xy-lōph'-ā-gī, s. pl. [XYLOPHAGA.]

Entom.: A sub-tribe of Beetles, tribe Tetramera, instituted by Latreille, and approximately equal to the family Scolytidæ (q. v.).

xy-lō-phāg'-ī-dæ, subst. pl. [Mod. Lat. xylophag(us); Lat. fem. pl. adj. suff. -idæ.]

Entom.: A family of Diptera, now reduced to a subfamily. Xylophaginae, or Xylophagides (q. v.).

xy-lō-phā-gī'-næ, xy-lō-phāg'-ī-dēs, subst. pl. [Mod. Lat. xylophag(us); Lat. fem. pl. adj. suff. -inæ, or masc. & fem. -ides.]

Entom.: A subfamily of Stratiomyidæ, having seven or eight free abdominal segments. The larvae are believed to live in rotten wood. Some South American species are an inch and a quarter long.

xy-lōph'-ā-goūs, adj. [XYLOPHAGA.] Feeding on and boring into wood.

"Chelura terebrans is one of the most injurious xylophagous crustaceans known. It is commonly found associated with another wood-borer, the Limnoria lignorum."—Cassell's Nat. Hist., vi. 212.

xy-lōph'-ā-gŭs, s. [XYLOPHAGA.]

Entomology: The typical genus of Xylophaginae (q. v.). The body is narrow and elongate, the antennæ a little longer than the head, which is short and transverse.

xy-lō-phā'-sī-ā, s. [Pref. xylo-, and Gr. phasis=appearance.]

Entom.: A genus of Night-moths, family Apamiidæ. Antennæ long, pubescent in the male; abdomen long, crested; fore wings long, more or less denticulated.

xy-lōph'-ī-lan, subst. [Mod. Lat. xylophil(i); Eng. suff. -an.]

Entom.: Any individual belonging to the Xylophili (q. v.).

xy-lōph'-ī-lī, s. pl. [Pref. xylo-, and Gr. phileō=to love.]

Entom.: A section of Lamellicorn Beetles, including Macleay's Dynastidæ and Rutelidæ (q. v.).

xy-lōph'-ī-loūs, adj. [XYLOPHILI.] Growing upon or feeding on wood.

xy-lō-phōne, s. [Pref. xylo-; Gr. phone=sound.]

Mus.: An instrument originally used among the northern nations of Europe. It consists of bars of wood or glass graduated in length to the musical scale, and resting on belts. Sounds are produced by striking on the bars with small hammers.

xy-lōph'-ŷl-lā, s. [Pref. xylo-, and Gr. phyllon=a leaf.]

Bot.: A genus of Phyllanthæ (q. v.), sometimes reduced to a sub-genus of Phyllanthus. Shrubs, without leaves, but with leaf-like branches bearing the flowers on notches in their margin. Natives of the tropics, especially of the West Indies, where they are called Seaside Laurels and Love-flowers.

xy-lō'-pī-ā, s. [Pref. xylo-, and Greek pikros=sharp, bitter.]

Bot.: The typical genus of Xylopeæ (q. v.). Trees or shrubs, with oblong or lanceolate leaves and axillary bracteate peduncles, one or many flowered; calyx, three to five lobed, the segments ovate, acute, coriaceous; petals, six, in two rows, the outer three the largest; stamens, many, inserted into a globose receptacle; carpels, two to fifteen, each with one or two seeds. Known species about twelve, some of which are often placed in the genus Habzelia (q. v.). Natives of South America and the West Indies. They readily strike root when a small fragment of them is placed in the ground. Xylopiæ sericea, the Pindaiba of Rio Janeiro, bears a highly aromatic fruit, which may be used as pepper, with which it agrees in its flavor. Good cordage is made from the fibers of its bark. The wood, bark, and berries of X. glabra, the Bitter-wood of the West Indies, taste like orange-seeds, and impart a similar flavor to the wild pigeons which feed on them. It is said to be useful in colic and for creating an appetite. Martius believes the fruit of X. grandiflora to constitute a valuable febrifuge used by the South American Indians. The dry fruits of X. aromatica form the Piper æthiopicum of commerce, used as pepper by the West African negroes.

xy-lō-pŷ-rōg'-rā-phŷ, s. [Greek xylon=wood; pyr (genit. pyros)=fire, and graphō=to write, to draw.] The act or art of drawing poker-pictures (q. v.).

xy-lō-rēt'-in-īte, s. [Pref. xylo-, and Eng. retinite; Ger. xyloretin.]

Min.: A hydrocarbon compound obtained by the action of alcohol on fossil pine-wood. Massive, but crystallizes in needles of the orthorhombic system from a naphtha solution. Color, white.

xy-lōs'-tē-in, s. [Mod. Lat. xylostium (see def.); Eng. suff. -in.]

Chem.: A glucoside obtained from the berries of the Fly Honeysuckle (Lonicera xylostium). It is non-volatile, very bitter, insoluble in water, very soluble in alcohol and ether, and yields sugar when decomposed by acids.

xy-lō-tēch-nō-grāph'-ī-ca, s. [Pref. xylo-; Gr. technē=an art, and graphikos=capable of drawing or painting.]

Art.: A process for staining wood of various colors, invented and patented by Mr. A. F. Brophy. It was announced early in 1875. (Haydn.)

xy-lō-tile, s. [Pref. xylo-, and Greek tilos=a fiber.]

Min.: A doubtful mineral; according to Dana is probably but an altered asbestos.

xy-lō-trū'-pēs, s. [Pref. xylo-, and Gr. trupaō=to bore, to pierce.]

Entom.: A genus of Dynastidæ or Dynastinæ, formerly merged in Dynastes. It includes large lamellicorn beetles. Xylotrupes gideon, a native of Malacca, attacks the cocoanut palm.

xy-lō'lŷl, s. [Gr. xylon=wood; suff. -yl.]

Chem.: C_8H_9 . The hypothetical radicle of xylene.

xy-lŷl'-ā-mine, s. [Eng. xylyl, and amine.]

Chem.: This name belongs to a base, $C_8H_9 \cdot H_2N = C_6H_4 \begin{cases} CH_3 \\ CH_2 \end{cases} (NH_2)$ (not yet obtained), related to benzylamine, $C_7H_7 \cdot H_2N$, in the same manner as xylydine, $C_8H_9(NH_2) = C_6H_3(NH_2) \begin{cases} CH_3 \\ CH_2 \end{cases}$, is related to toluidine, $C_6H_4(NH_2) \cdot CH_3$. (Watts.)

xy-lŷl-ēne, s. [Eng. xylyl; -ene.]

Chem.: C_8H_8 . A diatomic radicle related to xylyl, C_8H_9 , in the same manner as ethylene is related to ethyl. (Watts.)

xylylene-diamine, s.

Chem.: $C_8H_{12}N_2 = C_8H_{10}(NH_2)_2$. Xylenediamine. A crystalline compound formed by the action of tin and hydrochloric acid on dinitroxylene. It is soluble in water and alcohol, insoluble in ether.

xy-lŷl'-ic, a. [Eng. xylyl; -ic.] Pertaining to or containing xylyl.

fâte, fât, fâre, amidst, whât, fâll, father; wê, wêt, hêre, camêl, hêr, thêre; pine, pît, sîre, sîr, marîne; gô, pôť, wôr, wôre, wôlf, wôrċ, whô, sôn; mûte, cûb, cûre, unite, cûr, rûle, fûll; trŷ, Sŷrian. æ, œ = ē; ey = â. qu = kw.

xylylic-acid, s.

Chem.: $C_9H_{10}O_2 = C_6H_3(CH_3)_2CO_2H$. A crystalline body obtained by oxidizing cumene with potassic dichromate and sulphuric acid. It is sparingly soluble in boiling water, very soluble in alcohol and ether, melts at 103° , and boils at 273° . On treating it with chromic acid, it is converted into insoluble acid.

xyr'-id, s. [XYRIS.]

Bot. (pl.): The order Xyridaceæ (q. v.). (Lindley.)

xyr'-i-dā'-çē-æ, s. pl. [Mod. Lat. xyris, genit. xyrid(is); Lat. fem. pl. adj. suff. -aceæ.]

Bot.: Xyrids; an order of Endogens typical of the alliance Xyridales. Herbaceous, sedgy plants, with fibrous roots; leaves radical, ensiform, or filiform, with enlarged, scarious, sheathing bases; flowers in terminal, imbricated, scaly heads; sepals three, glumaceous; corolla gamopetalous, with three thin, long, and colored petaloid divisions; fertile stamens three, others, alternate with the divisions of the corolla, sterile; style trifid; ovary single, one-celled, with parietal placentæ bearing numerous ovules; fruit capsular, three-valved. Chiefly natives of the Tropics. There are two genera, Aboloba and Xyris (q. v.).

xyr'-id-al, a. [XYRIDALES.]

Bot.: Of or belonging to the genus Xyris, or to the order Xyridaceæ, as the xyridal alliance. (Lindley.)

xyr'-i-dā'-lēš, s. pl. [Masc. & fem. pl. of Mod. Lat. xyridalis.]

Bot.: Lindley's fourteenth alliance of Endogens. Hypogynous, bisexual, tripetaloid Endogens, with copious albumen. It contains four orders, Phylodraceæ, Xyridaceæ, Commelynaceæ, and Mayaceæ. (Lindley.)

xyr'-is, s. [Lat., from Gr. xyris=a kind of flag, Irifætidissima.]

Botany: The typical genus of Xyridaceæ (q. v.). Sedge-like plants, with narrow, radical leaves, and scapes bearing heads of yellow, fugaceous flowers. Known species about fifty, chiefly from tropical America, but a few from the hotter parts of the Eastern Hemisphere. The leaves and root of Xyris indica are given in India against ringworm, itch, and leprosy; those of X. americana and X. vaginata are used for a similar purpose, the former in Guiana, the latter in Brazil.

xyš-ma-lō'-bī-ūm, s. [Gr. xyisma=a filing, a shaving, and lobos=a legume, a pod. So named because the fruits are covered with scales.]

Bot.: A genus of Asclepiadaceæ. Erect perennial shrubs with large flowers in umbels; corolla bell-shaped, with spreading segments, staminal corona at the top of the tube of filaments, consisting of ten parts in a single series. Known species eight or nine, all but one from the Cape of Good Hope. The remaining one, Xysmalobium heudelotianum, is from Senegambia, where its root is eaten by the negroes. X. padifolium is cultivated in English gardens.

xyšt, xyšt'-ōs, xyšt'-ūs, s. [Lat. xystus, from Gr. xystos, from xyō=to scrape, from its smooth and polished floor.]

Anc. Arch.: A sort of covered portico or open court of great length in proportion to the width, in which the athletes performed their exercises.

xyš'-tarch, s. [Gr. xystos, and archō=to rule.]

Gr. Antiq.: An Athenian officer who presided over the gymnastic exercises of the xyst (q. v.).

xyš'-tēr, s. [Gr., from xyō=to rub, to scrape.]

Surg.: An instrument for scraping bones.

THE twenty-fifth letter of the English alphabet is, in modern English, both a consonant and a vowel. It is taken from the Latin, into which language it was adopted from the Greek (y) or upsilon. It sometimes represents an Anglo-Saxon character which is supposed to have a sound resembling that of the French u or German ü.

I. At the beginning of syllables, and when followed by a vowel, y is a palatal consonant, being formed by bringing the middle of the tongue in contact with the palate, nearly in the position to which the g hard brings it. Hence, the A. S. hard g has often been softened to y, as in day=A. S. dag, may=A. S. mag, &c. In words of Romance origin y frequently represents:

1. French -ie=Lat. -ia, as in barony, company, copy, jolly, family, memory, victory, &c.

2. Lat. -ium, as augury, horology, remedy, study, &c.

3. Lat. -atus, as attorney, deputy, ally, quarry.

4. Fr. -if; Lat. -ivus, as hasty (=O. Fr. hastif), jolly (=Mid. Eng. jolif; O. Fr. joli, fem. jolive), testy, &c.

5. Many words ending in y have come through Lat. nouns in -ia (=Fr. -ie), from Gr. -ia, -eia, as analogy, apology, blasphemy, philosophy, &c.

6. As an adjectival termination, y generally represents the A. S. -ig, as in stony=A. S. stānig, hungry=A. S. hungrig. So also in some nouns it represents A. S. -ig, as in honey=A. S. hunig. In the suffix, -ly it is both an adjectival and an adverbial suffix, and represents the A. S. -ic, -ice, or -iche, as godly=A. S. godlic, friendly=A. S. freōndlic, hardly=A. S. heardlice. In nouns ending in -ty, this ending represents the Fr. -té, Lat. -tatem (nominative -tas), as in vanity (=Fr. vanité, Lat. vanitatem, accus. of vanitas), calamity, &c.

II. In the middle, and at the end of words, y is a vowel, and is precisely the same as i. When accented it is pronounced as i long, as in dē-fy, dū-īng, &c., and when unaccented as i short, as in glōr-y, jōl-ly, cit-y, &c.

¶ Y was sometimes called the Pythagorean letter, from its Greek original in its form of three limbs representing the sacred triad formed by the dual proceeding from the monad.

¶ (1) As a symbol: In chem., Y is the symbol of Yttrium (q. v.).

(2) As a numeral: Y stands for 150, and with a dash over it (Ȳ) for 150,000.

y-, pref. [See def.] A common prefix in Mid. Eng. words, and representing the A. S. -e or ge-, as in yclept, yclad. It is the same as GE- (q. v.).

yāc'-a-rê, s. [JACARE.]

yāc'-ca, s. [Native name.] (See etym. and compound.)

yacca-wood, s.

Bot. & Comm.: The wood of Podocarpus coriacea, used in the West Indies as an ornamental timber for cabinet work.

yācht (ch silent), yatcht, subst. [Dutch jagt (formerly spelt jacht), so named from its speed, from Dut. jaften (formerly jachtin)=to speed, to hunt; jagt (formerly jacht)=a hunting, from jagen=to hunt or chase deer, hares, &c.; cogn. with Ger. jagen=to hunt; probably allied to Ger. jāhe; O. H. Ger. gāhi=quick, sudden, rash; Ger. gehen=to go; Dut. gaan, gaen=to go. (Skeat.)] A decked pleasure vessel; a light and elegantly fitted-up vessel, used either for racing or for pleasure trips, or as an official or state vessel to convey royal personages or Government officials from place to place. The rigs are various, and many pleasure yachts now have steam power as an accessory, or for use during calms. Racing yachts are built with very fine lines, enormous spars and sails, and have the hull deeply ballasted, thus sacrificing everything to speed.

yacht-club, s. A club or society of yacht-owners for racing purposes, &c., commanded by a commodore.

"I trust that some good yacht-club will not miss this opportunity."—Field, Oct. 3, 1885.

yācht (ch silent), v. i. [YACHT, s.] To sail or cruise about in a yacht.

yācht'-ēr (ch silent), s. [Eng. yacht; -er.] One who commands a yacht; one who sails or cruises about in a yacht.

yāchts'-man (ch silent), s. [English yacht, and man.] One who keeps or sails a yacht; one who is skilled in the management of a yacht.

"The way the ladies handled the boats was the admiration of many yachtsmen and others."—London Daily Telegraph.

yāchts'-man-ship (ch silent), s. [Eng. yachtsman; -ship.] The art or science of sailing or managing a yacht.

"The partisans of English yachtmanship need not be disconcerted."—St. James's Gazette, Sept. 8, 1886.

tyāchts'-wom-an (ch silent), s. [Eng. yacht, s., and woman.] A woman skilled in or fond of yachting.

"It [the Sea-Eagle] is much exposed to the attacks of marauding yachtsmen and yachtswomen."—Athenæum, Sept. 1, 1888, p. 294.

ya-cā-ma'-mā, s. [South Amer. Indian=Mother of Waters.]

Anthrop.: The Watermamma (q. v.).

yāf, pret. of v. [GIVE.]

yāff, v. i. [From the sound made.] [YAP.] To bark like a dog in a passion; to yelp; hence, to talk pertly. (Scotch.)

yāf'ne, yāf'-fīl, yāf'-fīn-gāle, yāf'-flēr, s. [For etym. see def. and extract.]

Ornith.: Provincial names for Gecinus viridis, the Green Woodpecker, from its ordinary cry, which is a cheerful, laughing-call, several times repeated, and which was formerly believed to be a sure sign of rain.

"'Yaffl' or 'Yaffingale' refers to the bird's common cry, which has been well compared by Gilbert White and many others to the sound of laughter."—Yarrell: Brit. Birds (ed. 4th) ii. 461.

yā'-gēr, s. [Ger. jäger=a huntsman, from jagen=to hunt.] A member of certain regiments of light infantry in the armies of various German states. The name is derived from their being originally composed of jägers or huntsmen. [Cf. CHASSEUR.]

yāg'-gēr, s. [Dut. jager=huntsman, a driver.] [YAGER.] A wanderer about the country; a travelling peddler. (Scotch.)

yā'-hoō, s. [A word of no etymology.] A name given by Swift in his Gulliver's Travels to a race of brutes, described as having human forms and vicious and degraded propensities. They were subject to the Houyhnhnms, or horses endowed with human reason. Hence, the term is applied to a rough, low, boorish, or uneducated person.

"The passionate exclamation of a mere yahoo of a stable-boy."—Graves: Spiritual Quixote, bk. iv, ch. x.

¶ Also used adjectively.

"That hated animal, a yahoo squire."—Warton: Newmarket, 170.

Yaj'-ūr, *Yaj'-ūsh, s. [Sansk. yaj=to sacrifice.] (See etym. and compound.)

Yajur-Veda, s.

Hindu Sacred Literature: The third portion of the Veda, generally called the third Veda. It consists not merely of verses from the Rig Veda, but also of prose sentences used at the offering of certain sacrifices. There are two editions called the Black and White Yajur. [VEDA.]

yak, s. [Native name.]

Zool.: Poephagus († Bos) grunniens, a species of ox from the mountainous regions of Tibet. There are two races: The wild yak, generally black, which is found near the snow line, descending into the valleys in winter, and a domesticated race of various colors, black and white being most common. The yak is about the size of the common ox, to which it has a general resemblance, but it is covered with a thick coat of long, silky hair, hanging down like the fleece of a sheep, completely investing the tail, and forming a lengthy fringe along the shoulders, flanks, and thighs. Mr. Bartlett considers that this fringe, which exists in both races, was developed as a protection to the animal in its alpine haunts, as the long hair forms a sort of mat which defends the body from the effects of cold when the animal is reposing in the snow. The domesticated race is of great importance to the natives of Tibet.

Yak.

The yak is employed as a beast of burden, but never for tillage or draught; the milk is very rich, and yields excellent butter; the flesh is of the finest quality, and that of the calves far superior to ordinary veal. The hair is spun into ropes, and made into coverings for tents, and the soft fur of the hump and withers is woven into a fine strong cloth. The tails, often dyed red, are made into the chowries, or fly-flappers, used in India. Yaks are often seen in zoological gardens and menageries, and have repeatedly been bred in Europe, and it is probable that they might be advantageously introduced into the Highlands of Scotland and the northern parts of the Continents of America and Europe.

yak-lace, s. A coarse strong lace made from the hair of the Yak (q. v.).

yald, a. [YELD, a.]

yald, yauld, adj. [Icel. gildr=stout, brawny, strong; Dan. & Sw. gild.] Supple, active, athletic. (Scotch.)

yām, s. [Fr. igname; Sp. name, from Port. in-hame, probably from some African language.]

Botany:

1. The root of various species of Dioscorea, of which more than 150 are known, also the plants themselves. They are herbs or undershrubs with fleshy tuberous roots, stems twining to the left hand; leaves generally alternate, always entire, and with several strongly marked veins running throughout their entire length. Inflorescence consisting of spikes of small unisexual flowers, with a perianth inclosing in the males six stamens and in the female a three-celled ovary. They are chiefly natives of America and of Asia, but a few are African, and three or four Australian. The Common Yam, Dioscorea sativa, is a native of Malabar, Java, and the Philippines; D. alata of the Moluccas and Java; D. globosa, D. purpurea, D. rubella, D. fasciculata of India; D. batatas of China and Japan; but most of these are now introduced into tropical countries to which they are not indigenous. The largest of the esculent roots of the several species of yam are two or three feet across, occasionally reaching thirty pounds weight. They are used as substitutes for potatoes in the regions where they grow. They are eaten either roasted or boiled, and the flower also is made into bread and puddings.

Yam.

2. (Pl.): The order Dioscoreaceæ. (Lindley.)

yām'-ā-dôu, s. (Guianan name.)

Bot.: An oil expressed from the seeds of Myristica sebifera, a tree about ten feet high, growing in Guiana.

yām'-ēr, yām'-mēr, yam-our, yom-er, v. i. [A. S. geómerian=to lament, from geómer (O. L. Ger. jamar, O. H. Ger. jamarer)=lamentable; O. H. Ger. jámaron=to lament; Ger. jammeren.] To lament, to fret, to cry, to yell, to whine. (Scotch or Provincial.)

yānk (2), s. An abbreviation of Yankee (q. v.).

yānk, v. t. & i. [Etym. doubtful; perhaps a nasalized form akin to Ger. jagen=to hunt.] [YACHT.]

A. Transitive:

1. To twitch or jerk powerfully. (Slang.)
2. To snatch away unexpectedly. (Slang.)

B. Intransitive:

1. To work cleverly and actively. Often with on; as, She yanked on at the work.
2. To speak in a yelping or affected tone; to scold, or nag.

Yān'-keē, s. & a. [A word of doubtful origin. According to Mr. Heckewelder (Indian Nations, p. 112, quoted in Bartlett: Dict. of Americanisms, s. v.), the word was the first effort of the Indians "to imitate the sound of the national name of the English, which they pronounced Yengees." According to Dr. W. Gordon (Hist. Amer. War, 1789, i. 324-5, quoted by Skeat), it was a favorite cant word in Cambridge, Mass., as early as 1713, and meant "excellent," as a yankee good horse, yankee good rider, &c. He supposes that it was adopted by the students there as a by-word, and, being carried by them from the college, obtained currency in the New England colonies, until at length it was taken up in other parts of the country, and applied to New Englanders generally as a term of slight reproach. Skeat, with reference to this account of the origin of the word, compares Lowland Scotch yankie=a sharp, clever, forward woman; yanker=an agile girl, an incessant talker, also=a smart stroke, a great falsehood, the fundamental idea being that of quick motion. [YACHT, s., YANK (1), s.]

A. As substantive:

1. The popular name for the citizens of New England, but applied by foreigners to all the inhabitants of the United States. During the American Revolution it was applied to all the insurgents, and during the Civil War it was the term commonly applied by the Confederate soldiers to the Federals.
2. A glass of whisky sweetened with molasses.

B. As adj.: Of or pertaining to the Yankees, or Americans.

Yankee-doodle, s.

1. The name given to a famous air, now regarded as one of the national airs of the United States.

Very many accounts have been given of its origin; some have professed to trace it to the time of the Great Rebellion, and have asserted that "Nankee Doodle" was a nickname for Cromwell, and that the rhyme

"Nankee Doodle came to town, on a little pony,
He stuck a feather in his cap, and called him macaroni," referred to his entry into Oxford. The term "macaroni" sufficiently confutes the theory, for the Macaroni Club did not come into existence till the middle of the eighteenth century. In all probability the tune is of English origin, and not more than a hundred and fifty years old. The first mention of it in print is said to occur in the Boston Journal of the Times for September, 1768:

"Those passing in boats observed great rejoicings, and that the Yankee Doodle song was the capital piece in the band of music."

The words, probably composed by Dr. Schuckburg, who served under General Amherst, in the French and Indian war of 1755, are now never heard. According to Mr. Barclay Squire, "as a melody it has little beyond simplicity in its favor, but there is a quaint, direct, and incisive character about it which redeems it from vulgarity, besides which the historical associations of the tune, connected as it is with the establishment of American Independence, should have saved it from some of the criticisms to which it has been subjected." (Grove: Dict. Music.)

2. A Yankee.

Yankee-doodledom, s. A term applied by the citizens of the Southern States to New England.

Yankee-gang, s. An arrangement in a saw-mill adapted for logs of 21 inches diameter and under. It consists of two sets of gang-saws, having parallel ways in the immediate vicinity of each other. One is the slabbing-gang, and reduces the log to a balk and slab-boards. The balk is then shifted to the stock-gang, which rips it into lumber.

Yān'-keē-fied, adj. [Eng. Yankee; -fy, -ed.] Like a Yankee; after the Yankee fashion.

"The Colonel whittled away at a bit of stick in the most Yankeeified way possible."—A Stray Yankee in Texas, p. 113. (Bartlett.)

A. & B. As pr. par. & particip. adj.: (See the verb.)

C. As subst.: The act of one who yawns; a yawn.

"With affected yawnings at the close."

Dryden: Hind and Panther, iii. 1,291.

¶ Physiologically, yawning is an inspiration, deeper and longer continued than a sigh, drawn through the widely open mouth, accompanied by a peculiar depression of the lower jaw, and frequently by an elevation of the shoulders. (Foster.)

yāwn'-īng-lŷ, adv. [Eng. yawning; -ly.] In a yawning manner; with yawns or gapes; drowsily.

"Leaning upon your idle elbow yawningly patter out those prayers whose sound or sense ye understand not."—Bp. Hall: The Hypocrite.

yāwp, s. [A variant of yelp.] A yelp or cry, as of a dog.

yāwp, v. i. [YAWP, s.] To yelp.

yāwŷ, s. [From a West African negro word yaw=a raspberry.]

Pathol.: A disease in which, without premonitory symptoms, portions of the skin, especially about the face, the scalp, the axilla, and the genitals, become covered with small, dusky red spots, which develop into raspberry or mulberry-like tubercles, sometimes ulcerating. The malady may continue for many years, or for life. It occurs chiefly in the West Indies, North America, and Africa. Called also Framboesia and Pian.

"A mysterious malady referred to as 'yaws.'"—M. Collins: Thoughts in my Garden, i. 54.

ŷ-clād', a. [Pref. y-, and English clad.] Clad, clothed.

y-drad, pret. & pa. par. of v. [DREAD, v.]

yē, pron. [A. S. ye (nom.), eower (gen.), eow (dat. & acc.); cogn. with Dut. gi=ye, u=you; Icel. er, ier=ye, ydhar=your, ydhr=you; Dan. & Sw. i=ye, iu=you; Ger. ihr; O. H. Ger. ir=ye, iūwar, iūwer=your; iu=you; Goth. jus=ye, izwara=your, izwis=you.] Properly the nominative plural of thou, the second personal pronoun, you being the dative and accusative, and your the genitive. But in later times ye was used as an objective as well as a nominative. Ye is now almost obsolete except in sacred or solemn writings or addresses, its place being taken by you. [You, YOUR.] The confusion between ye and you did not exist in Old English. Ye was always used as a nominative, and you as a dative or accusative. In the English Bible the distinction is very carefully observed; but in the dramatists of the Elizabethan period there is a very loose use of the two forms. Not only is you used as nominative, but ye is used as an accusative. (Morris: Hist. Outlines of English Accidence, § 155.)

"Vain pomp and glory of the world, I hate ye."
Shakesp.: Henry VIII., iii. 2.

yē, adv. [YEA.]

yeā, *ya, *yē, adv. & s. [A. S. geā=yea; cogn. with Dut., Dan., Sw., & Ger. ja; Icel. já; Goth. ja, jai; allied to Goth. jah; O. Sax. gia, ja; A. S. ge=also, and.]

A. As adverb:

1. A word expressing affirmation or assent; yes; ay; the opposite of no.

"Let your conversation be yea, yea, nay, nay."—Matthew v. 37.

¶ Originally yea, like nay, was used in reply to questions framed in the affirmative; as, Will he go? Yea (or nay). Yes and no, on the contrary, were used in questions framed negatively, as, Will he not go? Yes (or no). Yes was also used as a strong asseveration, often accompanied by an oath. The distinction between yea and yes was becoming neglected in England as early as the time of Henry VIII. Yea is now used only in writings or speeches of a solemn or sacred style.

2. Formerly used to introduce a subject with the sense of indeed, verily, truly, is it so? or, it is so.

"Yea, hath God said ye shall not eat of every tree in the garden?"—Genesis iii. 1.

3. Used as=nay, to reprove, or notice, or amplify what has gone before; not this alone; not only so but also; ay.

"I therein do rejoice; yea and will rejoice."—Phil. i. 18.

B. As substantive:

1. An affirmative; one who votes in the affirmative or in favor of any question or motion; an ay or aye.

2. In Scripture, used to denote certainty, consistency, harmony, and stability.

"All the promises of God in him are yea, and in him are amen."—2 Corinth. i. 20.

yea-forsooth, a. A term applied to one saying to anything yea and forsooth, which latter was not a term of genteel society; hence, low, vulgar.

"A rascally, yea-forsooth knave."—Shakesp.: Henry IV., Pt. II., i. 2.

yēad, *yeade, *yede, v. i. [A fictitious present tense and infinitive, formed from the old pa. t. yode, eode.] [YEDE.] To go, to proceed, to move along.

"Then badd the knight his lady yede aloof."

Spenser: F. Q., I. xi. 5.

yēan, v. i. & t. [A. S. ēdian=to ean; geēdian=to yeand; from ēacen=pregnant, prop. pa. par. of the lost verb ēacan=to increase, to augment; ēcan=to increase, to eke.] To bring forth young, as a sheep or lamb; to ean. [EKE.]

"There were serious complaints from those few districts where Dorset horn flocks yeand thus early."—London Daily Telegraph.

yēan'-līng, s. & a. [Eng. yeand; dimin. suff. -ling.]

A. As subst.: The young of sheep; a lamb, an eanling.

"To their store
They add the poor man's yeandling."

Ben Jonson: Sad Shepherd, i. 1.

B. As adj.: Lately yeand; young.

"To gorge the flesh of lambs or yeandling kids."

Milton: P. L., iii. 434.

yēar, *yeer, *yer, *yere, s. [A. S. geār, gēr=a year, pl. geār; cogn. with Dutch jaar; Icel. ár; Dan. aar (sing. & pl.); Sw. år; O. H. German jār; Ger. jahr; Goth. jer; allied to Gr. hōros=a season, a year; hōra=a season, an hour; Lat. hora; Eng. hour. As in Anglo-Saxon so in early times, the word was unaltered in the plural, like sheep, deer; as, "This seven year" (Shakesp.: Much Ado, iii. 3); hence the modern phrase, a two-year old colt, and the like.]

1. A unit of time, marked by the revolution of the earth in its orbit. The year is either astronomical or civil. The former is determined by astronomical observation, and is of different lengths, according to the point of the heavens to which the revolution is referred. When the earth's motion is referred to a fixed point in the heavens, as a fixed star, the time of revolution is the time which elapses from the moment when the star, the sun, and the earth are in a straight line, till they again occupy the same position; this is called a sidereal year. If the revolution is referred to one of the equinoctial points, the year is somewhat shorter than the sidereal year, on account of the precession of the equinoxes, that is, the retrogression of the equinoctial points along the ecliptic. This is called the equinoctial, tropical, or solar year. The length of the sidereal year is 365°25'6"12 mean solar days, or 365 days, 6 hours, 9 minutes, 9°6 seconds. The length of the solar or equinoctial year is 365°24'24"14 mean solar days, or 365 days, 5 hours, 48 minutes, 49°7 seconds. The difference between these two years is 19 minutes 19°2 seconds mean solar time, that being the time required for the earth to advance in its orbit a distance of 50'1" of arc. The civil year is the year of the calendar. It contains a whole number of days, beginning always at midnight of some day. According to the present system, or according to the Gregorian calendar, every year the number of which is not divisible by 4, also every year which is divisible by 100, and not by 400, is a common year, and contains 365 days. All other years are called leap years, and contain 366. The ecclesiastical year is from Advent to Advent. A lunar year is a period consisting of twelve lunar months. The astronomical lunar year consists of twelve lunar synodical months, or 354 days, 8 hours, 48 minutes, 36 seconds. The common lunar year consists of twelve lunar months or 354 days. The Embolismic, or Intercalary lunar year, consists of thirteen lunar civil months, and contains 384 days.

2. The period in which any planet completes a revolution; as, the year of Jupiter or of Saturn.

3. (Pl.) Used as equivalent to age, or old age.

"Myself am struck in years, I must confess."

Shakesp.: Taming of the Shrew, ii.

¶ (1) Anomalistic year: [ANOMALISTIC YEAR.]

(2) Gregorian year: [GREGORIAN.]

(3) Julian year: [JULIAN.]

(4) Sabbatical year: [SABBATIC.]

(5) Year and a day:

Law: The lapse of a year with one day added to it; a period which determines a right or works prescription in many cases.

(6) Year day and waste:

Law: Part of the sovereign's prerogative in England, whereby he was entitled to the profits for a year and a day of the tenements of persons attainted of petty treason or felony, together with the right of wasting the said tenements; afterwards restoring it to the lord of the fee. It was abolished by the Felony Act, 1870.

(7) Year of Grace: Any year of the Christian era.

(8) Year to year tenancy:

Law: A tenancy taken at first for a year, but which continues for a second year unless one of the parties on the expiration of the first six months intimates to the other his intention not to renew it. The same rule will obtain year after year till the six months notice of non-renewal is given.

year-book, s.

1. A book published annually, each issue containing new or additional information; a work published each year, and intended to supply fresh information compiled up to date on matters in regard to which changes are continually taking place.

"Not simply a year-book, as its name implies, but a year-book compiled by one who knows the meaning of the facts and figures which he has so laboriously put together."—London Globe.

2. A book containing annual reports of cases adjudged in the courts of England, from the time of Edward II. to that of Henry VII. inclusive, and published annually.

"The reports are extant in a regular series from the reign of king Edward the second inclusive; and from his time to that of Henry the eighth were taken by the prothonotaries, or chief scribes of the court, at the expense of the crown, and published annually, whence they are known under the denomination of the year-books."—Blackstone: Comment. (Introd., § 8.)

year's mind, *year-mind, subst. Here, mind means memorial rather than wish or intention. Hence, the original meaning of year-mind was that of a memorial, often a mass, a year subsequent to the decease of the individual to whom it was devoted. Or it might mean an anniversary; cf. month's mind.

yēared, a. [Eng. year: -ed.] Numbering years; aged.

single or associated in heaps or strings, each cell having an average diameter of $\frac{5}{100}$ of an inch, and consisting of a thin-walled sac or bag containing protoplasm. Yeast is the potent agent in the production of alcohol from sugar, each molecule of sugar splitting up into alcohol and carbonic anhydride, by a process which is not clearly understood. Heated to a temperature of 40°, its efficiency is almost entirely destroyed; but, when deprived of its water by straining and strong pressure, and kept in a cool place, it retains its properties unaltered for ten or twelve days. When washed with alcohol, dried at a low temperature, and mixed with a little starch, it retains the power of setting up the alcoholic fermentation for several months. Grape-juice, and several other vegetable juices, when left for a few days at a suitable temperature, develop yeast cells in great abundance, without any addition of yeast, probably from the presence of spores in the surrounding atmosphere. In bread-making, yeast, both in its liquid and dried states, is added with warm water to flour to give a start to the fermentation process, thereby supplying carbonic-acid gas, which communicates a spongy or light texture to the bread. It is also essential to the production of wine from grape juice and other fruit juices, the manufacture of beer, and the preparation of distilled spirits.

2. Pharm.: Beer yeast, when applied externally, acts as a stimulant and antiseptic. As a poultice it corrects the discharges of indolent ulcers. It has been given also internally in low states of the system, but with doubtful efficacy. (Garrod.)

¶ (1) Artificial yeast: Dough mixed with a small quantity of common yeast, made into cakes and dried.

(2) German yeast: Common yeast drained and pressed till nearly dry. In this state it can be kept for several months, and is much used by bakers.

(3) Patent yeast: Yeast collected from a wort of malt and hop, and prepared in the same manner as German yeast. [¶ (2).]

yeast-bitten, a.

Brewing: Too much affected by yeast.

"When the process of attenuation becomes so slack as not to exceed half a pound in the day, it is prudent to cleanse, otherwise the top-barm might re-enter the body of the beer, and it would become yeast-bitten."—Ure.

"Fall'n into the sear, the yellow leaf."
Shakesp.: Macbeth, v. 3.

B. As substantive.

1. Art. &c.: One of the three primary colors; a bright golden color, the type of which may be found in the field buttercup, which is a pure yellow. Mixed with blue, yellow yields green, and with red it produces orange. All our yellow pigments are alloyed with blue or red. Gamboge is a tolerably pure yellow pigment, but is tinged with blue; then comes gold ocher tinged with red; next yellow ocher and Naples yellow. The other yellow pigments are chrome yellow, lemon yellow, Indian yellow, gall-stone, Roman ocher, Mars yellow, terra di Sienna (raw and burnt), Indian pink, cadmium yellow, &c. The principal yellow dyes are obtained from arnotto, fustic, French berries, quercitron bark, turmeric, saw-wort, weld and willow leaves; also from chromate of lead, iron oxide, nitric acid, sulphide of antimony, and sulphide of arsenic. In blazonry, gold is the symbol of love, constancy, and wisdom; and, by opposition, yellow in our days still denotes inconstancy, jealousy, and adultery. In France the doors of traitors were daubed with yellow; and in some countries the law formerly ordained that Jews should be clothed in yellow because they had betrayed our Lord. Judas is represented clothed in yellow. In China yellow is the symbol of faith.

"Also your lordship shall understand that the coastes of the sea throughout all the world I haue colored with yellow, for that it may appeere that all that is within the line colored yellow is to be imagined to be maine land or islands, and all without the line so colored to bee sea, whereby it is easie and light to know it."—Hackluyt: Voyages, vol. i., p. 216.

2. Botany: A genus of colors of which the typical species, called simply yellow (in Latin luteus, in words of Greek composition xantho-), is of a gamboge hue. The other species are lemon-colored, golden-yellow, pale-yellow, sulphur-colored, straw-colored, leather-yellow, ocher-color, waxy-yellow, yolk-of-egg, apricot-color, orange-color, saffron-colored, isabella-color, testaceous-tawny, and livid. (Lindley: Introd. to Botany (3d ed.), pp. 478-479.) yellow-bark, s. The yellow, or orange-yellow, febrifugal bark of Cinchona flava or aurantiaca, consisting of the bass or inner bark. Called also Calisaya-bark.

yellow-barred brindle, s.

Entom.: A European Geometer moth, Lobophora viretata, and the caterpillar of which feeds on the privet.

yellow-belle, s.

Entom.: A rare European Geometer moth, Apsilates citraria, of the family Fidonidæ. It is found near Plymouth and in Ireland.

yellow-bellied flying-phalanger, s. [PETAURUS.] yellow-bellied water-mouse, s.

Zoöl.: Hydromys chrysogaster, from New South Wales.

yellow-berries, s. pl. The dried, unripe berries of Rhamnus infectorius. They are brought from the South of Europe and the Levant to be used in dyeing.

yellow-billed woodpecker, s.

Ornith.: Sphyrapicus varius, distributed over the United States.

yellow-bird, s.

Ornithology:

1. Chrysomitris tristis, the American Goldfinch, or Thistle-bird, generally distributed over North America. Length about five inches; male bright gamboge-yellow, with black crown, wings, and tail; band across wings, inner margin of tail feathers and tail coverts white; female of duller plumage.

2. Dendroica aestiva, common throughout the United States. Length about five inches; head and lower parts bright yellow, rest of upper parts olive-yellow; back, breast, and sides streaked with brownish-red; two yellow bands on wings. Called also the Yellow-Poll Warbler and Summer Yellow Bird. The Cow-bird often deposits one of its parasitic eggs in the nest of the Summer Yellow Bird, which being unable to eject the large strange egg, pecks a hole in it and buries it at the bottom of the nest. If by chance the Cow-bird visits the same nest a second time, the egg is again buried, and thus are formed the three-storied nests occasionally found by egg-hunters. (Ripley & Dana.) yellow-blossomed, a. Bearing or having yellow blossoms.

yellow-boy, s. A gold coin, especially an eagle, or a sovereign. (Slang.) yellow-deal, s.

Timber-trade: The timber of Pinus sylvestris.

yellow-earth, s.

Comm.: A yellowish clay colored by iron, sometimes used as a pigment. (Goodrich.)

yellow-fever, s.

Pathol.: An acute, infectious, malignant fever, occurring mainly in subtropical regions. The germs of this fever are more likely to abound in low, moist, badly ventilated places than at an elevation where the air is dry and a good circulation is maintained. They are seldom taken into the system in food or drink, but usually enter the lungs with the air, and persons catch the disease from being in an infected region, attending patients, or handling clothing or bedding that has been used by one having the fever. Any exposure that produces a chill is apt to precipitate the attack when other circumstances are propitious. Hence, in a tropical climate, chilling is far more to be avoided than getting too hot. When the fever first makes its attack it behaves so much like some other maladies that it cannot be recognized with certainty. Especially is it likely to be confounded with malarial fever or with dengue. But there are some distinguishing symptoms. Malaria is likely to make itself known by a severe chill; yellow fever is often accompanied by one so light that it is hardly noticed. In the former disease a good deal of bile is vomited and only a little in the latter. Dengue, a mild fever common in the Southern States, is accompanied with soreness, but this is in the bones and joints, whereas in yellow fever the pain is in the muscles. Then again, dengue has a certain well-defined rash between the shoulder and the throat. Yellow fever has not. Three important characteristic symptoms of yellow fever are: (1) a yellowish skin, as in jaundice, and slightly blood-shot eyes; (2) albuminuria; (3) a peculiar relation between the pulse and temperature. In most fevers these go up and down together, though perhaps not at the same rate. But in this particular fever the temperature often rises, while the pulse goes down. The onset of the disease is sudden, the patient feels weak, perhaps he has a chill, has pains in back and limbs, hot, dry skin, flushed face, nausea, violent headache, intense thirst and no appetite. Delirium is often present. After from one to three days of this fever there comes a lull, in which the symptoms all abate, the flushed face gives place to a yellow or jaundiced skin. Sometimes convalescence commences at this period and the patient recovers; otherwise collapse ensues, the skin assumes a deep yellow or bronzed appearance, the pulse becomes rapid and feeble, there is profound debility, the patient experiences great gastric irritability, and after occasionally vomiting food and bile, throws up blood that has become black; then follow coma, convulsions and delirium, death usually occurring on the 4th to the 6th day. Sarnarelli, the Italian physician who discovered the yellow fever microbe, finds that there are at least three possible causes of death in a case of yellow fever. He notices that the bacilli which are characteristic of other diseases are frequently associated with those of yellow fever in the bodies of the patients; and he thinks that in some instances the fever runs its course without serious harm and that then the microbes of the other malady put in their appearance and carry the patient off. Secondly, there are deaths in consequence of the poison produced in the system by the bacillus of the fever. These are direct consequences of the disease, of course. Thirdly, it often happens that enough injury is done to the kidneys by the yellow fever germs to cause uræmic poisoning. One attack of the disease protects against subsequent seizures.

yellow-fibers, s. pl.

Anat.: Elastic fibers of a yellow color, occurring in areolar tissue (q. v.).

yellow-flag, s. Bot.: Iris pseudacorus.

yellow-gum, s. 1. Pathol.: The jaundice of infants, icterus infantum. 2. [BLACK-GUM.]

yellow-hammer, yellow-ammer, yellow-bunting, s.

I. Ordinary Language:

Ornith.: Emberiza citrinella, widely distributed over Europe and North America. Length about seven inches; general color bright, with patches of dark brown, richly-mottled brownish-yellow on back, with a warm ruddy tinge; primaries black, edged with yellow; chin, throat, and under part of body bright, pure yellow turning to dusky-brown on the flanks; tail slightly forked, and shorter than in the Common Bunting. The female is similarly marked, but less bright in hue. The Yellow-hammer frequents hedges and low trees; it nests on the ground, and the male assists in incubation. The song consists of few notes, but is sweet and pleasing.

2. Fig.: A gold coin; a yellow-boy. (Slang.)

"Is that he that hath gold enough? Would I had some of his yellow hammers!"—Shirley: Bird in a Cage.

yellow Hercules, s.

Botany: A plant, Xanthoxylon clava Herculis, meaning the club or cudgel of Hercules. So called because in the West Indies the young prickly stems are often made into walking-sticks.

yellow-horned moth, s.

Entom.: A European Night-moth, Cymatophora flavicornis. Fore wings pale, greenish-gray, with darker portions; hind wings grayish-brown. Expansion of wings, an inch and a half. The caterpillar feeds, in September, on the birch, rolling up the leaves to obtain shelter for itself.

yellow-jack, s.

1. Yellow-fever. (Colloq.)
2. The flag displayed from lazarettos, naval hospitals, and vessels in quarantine.

yellow-jacket, s. A small species of wasp with an exceedingly painful sting.

yellow-jasmine, s.

Bot.: Gelsemium sempervirens. [GELSEMIUM.]

yellow journal, s. A sensational journal or newspaper. Sensational literature was formerly bound in yellow paper covers, hence the name "yellow journal."

yellow journalism, s. Sensational journalism.

"I have referred particularly to the work that is done by women in yellow journalism, because the most difficult, the most enterprising, the most sensational, and the most original work on this class of papers is done by women. Nearly all of the women employed on a yellow journal are known as special writers. To be sure, work of a difficult and dangerous order is required of the men on the staff, work in which the risking of life and limb is not taken into account."—Elizabeth L. Banks, in Nineteenth Century for Aug., 1898.

yellow-lake, s. Various pigments of a bright color, not affected by an impure atmosphere, but rapidly altering under the influence of oxygen and light. (Weale.)

yellow-legged clear-wing, s.

Entom.: A British Hawk Moth, Trochilium cynipiforme (Stainton); Sesia cynipiformis (Newman). Fore wings transparent, with the costa and hind margin black; under margin and transverse central spot blue-black, tinged with orange; body black, with yellow rings and stripes; the expansion of wings about an inch. Caterpillar feeds under the bark of the oak. The perfect insect appears in June.

yellow-legs, s.

Ornith.: The Yellow-shanked Sandpiper (q. v.).

"The well-known Yellow-legs of Eastern sportsmen has a very abundant distribution throughout all the United States."—Baird, Brewer, & Ridgway: Water Birds of North America, i. 273.

yellow-line quaker, s.

Entomology: A European Night-moth, Orthosia macilenta. It is of a yellowish, ochery color. The caterpillar, which is reddish-brown with white dots, feeds on beech.

yellow-loosestrife, s.

Bot.: Lysimachia vulgaris.

yellow-metal, s. A sheathing alloy of copper, 2; zinc, 1. [MUNTZ-METAL.]

yellow-nuphar, s. The yellow water-lily, Nuphar luteum or lutea. [NUPHAR.]

yellow-ocher, s.

Chem.: An argillaceous earth, colored by an admixture of oxide of iron. When finely ground, it is used as a pigment.

yellow-orpiment, s. [ORPIMENT.]yellow ox-eye, s.

Bot.: Chrysanthemum segetum.

yellow-pimpernel, s.

Bot.: Lysimachia nemorum.

yellow-pine, s.

Botany: (1) Pinus mitis; (2) P. australis. Both grow in the United States.

yellow pocket-mouse, s.

Zoöl.: Cricetodipus flavus, a minute rodent, from the Rocky Mountains. Its fur is pale buff.

yellow-race, s.

Ethnology: A term sometimes applied to the Chinese, Japanese, Mongols, Lapps, Esquimaux, &c.

yellow-rattle, s.

Botany: A name for the genus Rhinanthus. It belongs to the order Scrophulariaceæ, or figworts, and is called Rattle because the seeds when ripe rattle in the husky capsules. The typical species, the Common Yellow-rattle (Rhinanthus cristagalli), with its two sub-species, the Greater and the Lesser Yellow-rattles, is wild in Europe. All the three, as their names imply, have yellow flowers. [RHINANTHUS.]

yellow-ringed carpet, s.

Entom.: A Geometer Moth, Larentia flavicinctata. It occurs in the northwest of Europe.

yellow-rocket, s.

Botany: Barbarea vulgaris. It is called also the Bitter Winter-cress. [BARBAREA, WINTER-CRESS.]

yellow-root, s.Botany:

1. Xanthorrhiza apiifolia. Its long roots and rootstock are bright yellow, as are its leaves, bark, and pith. It grows in the Southern States of North America. The yellow-root is intensely bitter, and is used as a tonic. The native Indians formerly employed it as a dye.

2. Hydrastis canadensis. This also has a yellow root, or rather an underground stem, and was formerly employed by the Indians in dyeing yellow. It likewise is tonic. The fruit is like that of the raspberry, but the plant belongs to the Ranunculaceæ.

yellow-sally, s.

Entomology: Chloroperla viridis, a small green species, belonging to the family Perlidæ. Called also the Willow-fly.

yellow-shanked sandpiper, yellow-shanks, subst.

Ornithology: Totanus flavipes, an American bird. Length ten to eleven inches; shades of gray varied with brown and black above, pure white beneath; bare parts of legs and toes yellow. (See extract.)

"The food of the yellow-shanks consists of small fishes, shrimps, worms, aquatic and other insects, and sandhoppers. Its habits are similar to those of other sandpipers."—Yarrell: Brit. Birds (ed. 4th), iii. 481.

yellow-shell, s.

Entom.: A European Geometer Moth, Camptogramma bilineata. It has yellow wings with white lines. The caterpillar, which is nocturnal, feeds on grasses.

yellow-snake, s.

Zoöl.: Chilobothrus inornatus, from Jamaica.

yellow-soap, s. [SOAP, s.]yellow-spot, s. [MACULA-LUTEA.]yellow-spotted emys, s.

Zoöl.: Emys hamiltoni, a river tortoise, inhabiting the Ganges.

yellow-succory, s.

Bot.: Picris hieracioides.

yellow-suckling, s.

Bot. & Agric.: Trifolium minus.

yellow-sultan, s.

Bot.: Centaurea suaveolens.

yellow-tail, s.

Ichthy.: A popular name for the genus Seriola (q. v.).

yellow-tail moth, s.

Entomology: A European moth, Liparis auriflua. Wings satiny white, the fore ones with a black spot near the anal angle; body white, the apex of the abdomen golden yellow. The caterpillar feeds on the hawthorn, spinning a web among its food. The perfect insect appears in July.

yellow-tellurium, s.

Min.: The same as MUELLERINE (q. v.).

yellow-throat, s.

Ornith.: Swainson's name for the genus Trichas (q. v.).

yellow-tissue, s.

Anat.: Elastic tissue (q. v.).

yellow-top, s. A variety of turnip. So called from the color of the skin on the upper part of the bulb. Also a variety of grass, a species of agrostis.

yellow-tubercles, s. pl. [TUBERCLE, 3.]yellow-underwing, s.

Entom.: The genus Triphæna (q. v.). The caterpillars are called Surface grubs.

yellow-vetchling, s.

Bot.: Lathyrus aphaca.

yellow-viper, s.

Zoöl.: Bothrops lanceolatus. [FER-DE-LANCE.]

yellow wall-lichen, s.

Bot.: Parmelia parietina.

2. A force of volunteer cavalry first embodied in Britain during the wars of the French Revolution, and consisting to a great extent of country gentlemen and farmers. They are liable to be called out in aid of the civil power in case of riot at any time; in case of actual invasion, or the appearance of an enemy on the coast, or during a rebellion, they may be assembled for active service; they are then subject to the Mutiny Act and Articles of War, and may be called upon to serve in any part of Great Britain. During permanent service they receive cavalry pay and an allowance for forage. They undergo six days' training, and must attend a certain number of drills yearly, for which they receive 7s. a day as subsistence allowance, and 2s. for forage. Arms and ammunition are provided by the War Office, and there is an annual allowance of £2, or about $9.74, per man; but each man has to provide his own horse, which is exempt from taxation.

yeveering-bells, s. pl.

Bot.: Pyrola secunda.

*yew (ew as ū), (1), *yewe, s. [EWE.]

yew (ew as ū), (2), *eugh, *ew, *ewe, *yeugh, *yowe, *yugh, s. & a. [A. S. iw, iū; cogn. with Dut. yf; Icel. yr; O. H. Ger. iwa; Ger. eibe. Probably of Celtic origin; cf. Ir. iubhar=a yew; Gael. iubhar, iughar=a yew-tree, a bow; Wel. yw, ywen; Corn. hivin; Bret. ivin, ivinen.

A. As substantive:

I. Ordinary Language.

1. In the same sense as II.

*2. A bow.

"Tubal with his yew

And ready quiver did a boar pursue."

Sylvestre: Handie Crafts, 490.

II. Bot.: The genus Taxus, spec. Taxus baccata, under which Sir J. Hooker places its six supposed species. An evergreen with spreading branches, linear acute leaves more or less falcate, coriaceous, shining above, paler below, arranged in two ranks. Male catkins yellow, about a quarter of an inch long; females minute; fruit a red mucilaginous drupe or berry with green seed. It is indigenous in most parts of Continental Europe and in the Himalayas 6,000 to 10,000 feet above the sea-level, being in the last-named regions a much loftier tree than in England. The sap-wood of the yew is white, the heart-wood red, hard, close-grained, and susceptible of a fine polish. It weighs fifty-nine pounds to the cubic foot. It is prized in Europe by cabinet-makers, and was formerly much used in England, as it still is in the Himalayas, for bow-making; this is said to be at least one reason why our ancestors planted it in so many English churchyards. In some parts of the Khasia hills in Nepal the yew is deemed sacred, and its wood is burnt as incense. In Tibet a viscid exudation from it, mixed with other gums, is similarly employed. A red dye is made from the tree in the Bhutia country. Bentley and Trimen state that the leaves and young branches in all circumstances act as a narcotico-acrid poison on human beings, horses, and cows; that the seed of the fruit is poisonous, but that the pulp surrounding it is not so. The bark is used in Kunawar as a substitute for tea, or is mixed with tea-leaves. In India its leaves and fruit, which somewhat resemble digitalis in their effects, have been employed as a lithic in calculus, and as an antispasmodic in epilepsy and convulsions. There is an advantage in yew over digitalis—that the former does not accumulate in the system like the latter.

B. As adverb.: Pertaining to or relating to yew-trees; made of the wood of the yew-tree.

*yew-bow, subst. A shooting bow made of yew, much used formerly by English bowmen.

yew-brimble, s.

Entomology: Various species of the genus Plusia (q. v.). They are so called because they have on each of their wings a mark like a capital Y. The Plain Golden Y is Plusia iota, its fore wings are rosy gray; the Beautiful Golden Y is P. pulchrina; the fore wings are purplish gray; the Silver Y, P. gamma, called also the Gamma Moth, has the fore wings violet gray, clouded with dark gray. It is abundant everywhere, the caterpillar feeding on various low plants. The Scarce Silver Y, P. interrogationis, has the fore wings bluish gray.

yode, yod, pret. of v. [*A. S. eode=*went, plural eodon.] [YEDE.] Went.

"Well weened he that fairest Florimell
It was with whom in company he yode."
Spenser: F. Q., III. viii. 19.

yô'-dêl, yô'-dle, v. t. or i. [Ger. Swiss.] To sing or utter a sound, peculiar to the Swiss and Tyrolese mountaineers, by suddenly changing from the natural voice to the falsetto.

"The yodelist began to play once more, and continued to yodel until the thunder died away in the distance."—Detroit Free Press.

yô'-dêl, yô'-dle, subst. [YODEL, v.] A sound or tune peculiar to the Swiss and Tyrolese mountaineers.

"The yodelist was one of those fellows who doesn't know enough to get in out of the wet—he yodeled his plaintive yodel right along."—Detroit Free Press.

yô'-dêl-ist, s. [Eng. yodel, v.; -ist.] One who yodels. (See extract under YODEL, s.)

Yô'-ga, s. [*Sanscrit=*union, fitness, spiritual abstraction.]

Hindu Philos.: One of the six Darsanas, i. e., schools or systems of Brahmanical Philosophy, that of Patanjali, the essence of which is meditation. It believes in a primordial soul which has had existence from an earlier period than primeval matter, and holds that from the two arose the spirit of life (Mahanatma). Theoretically at least, its devotees can acquire even in this world entire command over elementary matter by certain ascetic practices, such as long continued suppression of the respiration, inhaling and exhaling the breath in a particular manner, sitting in eighty-four attitudes, fixing the eyes on the tip of the nose, and endeavoring, by the force of mental abstraction, to unite themselves with the vital spirit which pervades all nature and is identical with Siva. When this mystic union is effected, the Yogi can make himself lighter than the lightest, or heavier than the heaviest substance, or as small or as large as he pleases; he can traverse all space, can become invisible, can equally know the past, the present, and the future, and can animate any dead body by transferring to it his own spirit; finally he becomes united with Siva, and is exempt from the necessity of undergoing further transmigrations. [YOGI.]

yô'-gî, yô'-gîn, subst. [Sansc., &c., from Yoga (q. v.).]

Brahmanism (pl.): The Yogis are a Saivavite sect, founded by Goraknatha. They profess to be descendants of men who, by the practice of Yoga (q. v.), obtained power of effecting supernatural results. They go about India as fortune-tellers and conjurers. They have a temple at Gorakhpore, and traces of the order exist at Peshawur.

yô'-îck, yô'-icks, s. [From the sound made.] An old hunting cry.

yô'-îck, v. t. [YOICK, s.] To cheer or urge on with a yoick.

"Hounds were barely yoicked into it at one side when a fox was tallied away."—Field, Jan. 23, 1886.

yô'-jan, s. [*Sansc. yojana, from yuj=*to join.] In Hindustan, a measure of distance varying in different places from four to ten miles, but generally reckoned as equivalent to five miles.

yôke, yocke, yok, s. [*A. S. geoc, gioc, ioc=*a yoke; cogn. with Dut. juk; Icel. ok; Dan. aag; Sw. ok; Goth. juk; O. H. Ger. jôh; Ger. joch; Wel. ian; Lat. jugum; (whence Ital. giogo; Span. yogo; Fr. joug); Russ. igo; Lith. jungas; Gr. zugon; *Sansc. yuga=*a yoke, pair, couple; from the same root as *Lat. jungo=*to join; *Greek zeugnymi=*English join (q. v.).]

I. Ordinary Language:

1. Literally:

(1) A bar which connects two of a kind, usually; as, the ox-yoke, fastened by bows on the necks of a pair of oxen, or by thongs to the horns or foreheads of the oxen in some countries. An old contrivance by which pairs of draught animals, especially oxen, were fastened together. It generally consists of a piece of timber hollowed or made curving near each end, and fitted with bows for receiving the necks of the oxen, by which means two are connected for drawing. From a ring or hook in the bow a chain extends to the thing to be drawn, or to the yoke of another pair of oxen behind.

"A red heifer on which never came yoke."—Numb. xix. 2.

(2) Hence applied to anything resembling a yoke; as—

(a) The neck-yoke, by which the fore end of the tongue is suspended from the hames or collars of a span of horses.

(b) A frame to fit the shoulders and neck of a person, and support a couple of buckets suspended from the ends of the yoke.

(c) A cross-bar or curved piece from which a bell is suspended for ringing it.

(d) Devices to be attached to breachy animals, to prevent their crawling or breaking through or jumping over fences, are sometimes called yokes.

(e) A branching coupling section, connecting two pipes with a single one, as the hot and cold water pipes, with a single pipe for a shower-bath.

(f) A head-frame of a grain-elevator, where the belt passes over the upper drum and its cups discharge into the descending chute.

(g) A form of carriage clip which straddles the parts, and is tightened by nuts beneath the plates.

(3) Something which couples, connects, or binds together; a bond, a link, a tie.

"Whose souls do bear an equal yoke of love."

Shakesp.: Merchant of Venice, iii. 4.

(4) A pair of draught animals, especially oxen, yoked together.

"A half acre of land, which a yoke of oxen might plow."
—1 Samuel xiv. 14.

(5) As much land as might be plowed by a yoke of oxen in a day; hence, as much work generally as is done at a stretch; also, a portion of the working-day, as from meal-time to meal-time, during which work is uninterruptedly carried on.

(6) Two upright spears with a third crossing them at the top for vanquished enemies to pass under. In B. C. 328 the Samnites are said to have compelled the Romans literally to pass under such a yoke as a badge of servitude. The Romans, having afterward vanquished them, treated them similarly, B. C. 307 and 294.

2. Fig.: Used as an emblem of servitude, slavery, and sometimes of sufferance or submission generally.

"Take ye me my yok on you, and lerne ye of me."—Wycliffe: Matthew xi.

II. Naut.: A bar attached to the rudder-head and projecting in each direction sideways; to its ends are attached the steering-ropes or yoke-lines, which are handled by the coxswain or steersman, or pass to the drum on the axis of the steering-wheel. The yoke is principally used in rowing-boats.

yoke-arbor, s.

Mack.: A form of double journal-box for pulley-spindles, in which a curved branch extending from one bearing to the other on each side of the pulley serves to protect the belt from being chafed or otherwise injured.

yoke-elm, s.

Botany: The Hornbeam, Carpinus betulus. So called because yokes are made of the wood.

yoke-fellow, s. One associated with another in labor, a task, undertaking, or the like; one connected with another by some tie or bond; a companion, an associate, a mate, a partner.

"Yoke-fellows were they long and well approved."

Wordsworth: Excursion, bk. vii.

yoke-line, yoke-rope, s. [YOKE, s., II.]

yōū, pronoun. [A. S. eōw, dat. & accus. of ge = ye (q. v.)] The nominative and objective of thou. Although it is strictly applicable only to two or more persons, it has long been commonly used in addressing a single person, instead of thou or thee, but properly with a plural construction, as you are, you were. It was formerly used even by good writers with a singular verb, as you was, but this is now considered incorrect and vulgar. It is frequently used reflexively for yourself.

"Put you in your best array."

Shakesp.: As You Like It, v. 2.

It is also used expletively or superfluously:

(1) In easy, colloquial or idiomatic phraseology as a kind of dative.

"I will roar you as gently as a sucking dove."—Shakesp.: Midsummer Night's Dream, i. 2.

(2) Emphatically, sportively, or reproachfully, before a vocative.

"You madcap."—Shakesp.: Two Gentlemen, ii. 5.

(3) When you is used both before and after a vocative, there is an increase of playfulness, reproachfulness, tenderness, or vituperative force.

"You minion, you!"

Shakesp.: Comedy of Errors, iv. 4.

¶ You is also used indefinitely, in the same manner as we or they, for anyone, people generally; and is thus equivalent to the Fr. on, Eng. one.

"In these times you stand on distance."—Shakesp.: Merry Wives, ii. 1.

yōū, s. [YU.]

yōūng, yong, yonge, yōong, younge, yung, a. & s. [A. S. geong, giung, iung, geng, ging; cogn. with Dut. jong; Icel. ungv, jungv; Dan. & Sw. ung; O. H. "So many days my ewes have been with young."

Shakesp.: Henry VI., Pt. III., ii. 5.

(2) Young Men's Christian Association:

Societies: An Association, inaugurated in London, England, June 6, 1844, the founder being Mr. George Williams. It had for its original object the holding of religious meetings in houses of business in the center of London. Many similar associations springing up and becoming affiliated together, a General Conference of Delegates from the Associations of Europe and America was held in Paris in August, 1855, and the following Basis of Alliance was agreed to:

"The Young Men's Christian Association seek to unite those young men who, regarding the Lord Jesus Christ as their God and Savior, according to the Holy Scriptures, desire to be His disciples in their doctrine and in their life, and to associate their efforts for the extension of His kingdom among young men."

No antagonism is intended toward the churches; on the contrary, these associations

"consider it alike their privilege and their duty to lead young men into the fellowship of the Churches, and under the influence of the Christian ministry."

The first meeting was held in a London warehouse; now the head-quarters of the English union are at Exeter Hall, Strand, purchased for the purpose. The American headquarters are at No. 40 East Twenty-third Street, New York City. In the Report of the National Council, issued in July, 1894, the Young Men's Christian Associations (each autonomous, though affiliated with the rest), are stated to be 4,968, with a membership of 267,052. Of these 1,356 associations, with 245,721 members, are in the United States; 658 associations, with 75,000 members, in Great Britain and Ireland; and 1,005 associations, with 80,000 members, in Germany. In August, 1888, an International Congress of these Associations was held in Stockholm. The following are the numbers of associations all over the world:

(3) Young People's Society of Christian Endeavor: The first Society of Christian Endeavor was formed February 2, 1881, in the Williston Church, Portland, Me., by Rev. F. E. Clark, pastor, for the purpose of training a large number of converts for the duties of church membership. Each society is in some local church, and in no sense outside. It exists simply to make the young people loyal and efficient members of the Church of Christ. It is the Church training the young. Its motto is, "For Christ and the Church." September 15, 1893, there were 27,841 societies, with a membership of 1,650,000, chiefly in the United States and Canada, and in Australia, Great Britain, and in all missionary lands. It is found in about the same proportions in all the great evangelical denominations and in all their subdivisions. Wherever it has been established longest it is most fully indorsed by pastors and churches. Its essential features are the prayer-meeting pledge, honestly interpreted, the lookout, prayer-meeting and social committees, and the consecration meeting. Other committees are optional, and the constitution is entirely flexible in other points according to the needs of the local church.

(4) Young Women's Christian Association: A woman's religious society designed to afford to women benefits similar to those conferred on the other sex by the Young Men's Christian Association. It was founded in 1857 by the Dowager Lady Kinnaid, and has branches all over the world.

As she was wont in youth and summer days."
Spenser: Shepherd's Calendar; November.

younk'-ēr, *yonk-er, *yoonk-er, s. [Borrowed from Dutch jonker, jonkheer, from jong=young, and heer=a lord, sir, gentleman; Old Dutch jonck-heer, joncker.] A young person; a lad; a youngster; hence, an inexperienced or raw person or youth.

you-pon, s. [YAPON.]

yoür, *youre, a. [A. S. eower, genit. of ge=ye (q. v.); O. Sax. iwar; Dut. uwer; O. H. German iwar; Ger. euer.] Properly the possessive pronoun of the second person plural, but now commonly used like you, either as singular or plural.] Of or pertaining or belonging to you; as, your book, your house, &c.

¶ Like you, your is used indefinitely, not with reference to the person addressed, but to what is known and common; sometimes also contemptuously.

"All your writers do consent that ipse is he."—Shakesp.: As You Like It, v. 1.

yoürs, *youres, poss. pron. [A. S. eowres, genit. sing. masculine and neuter of eower=your (q. v.).] Of or belonging to you; used with reference to a preceding noun; as, This book is mine, that is yours.

¶ Used substantively—

(1) That or those belonging to you; your property, friends, or relations.

"Doth turn his hate on you or yours."
Shakesp.: Richard III., ii. 1.

(2) Yours truly, yours faithfully, yours to command, &c.: Phrases immediately preceding the signature at the end of a letter; hence, used playfully by a speaker in alluding to himself.

yoür-sēlf (pl. yoür-sēlves), pron. [Eng. your, and self.] You and not another or others; you, in your own person or individuality. When used as a nominative generally accompanied by you, it expresses emphasis in opposition; as, you must do it yourself, you yourself must do it=you must do it personally. Sometimes used without you.

"Carry your letters yourself."

Shakesp.: Two Gentlemen, i. 1.

¶ In the objective case it is used reflexively, without emphasis.

"Make yourself ready."—Shakesp.: Tempest, i. 1.

yoüth, *youthē, *yuwedhe, *yughedhe, subst. [A. S. geōgudh, giōgudh; cognate with O. Sax. jugudh; Dut. jeugd; O. H. Ger. jugund; German Jugend. The A. S. geōgudh is for geongudh, from geong=young, with suff. -th; hence youth is for youngth.] [YOUNG.]

1. The quality or state of being young; youthfulness; youngness.

"If I but smiled a sudden youth they found."

Pope: Wife of Bath.

2. The part of life which succeeds childhood; the whole early part of life from infancy to manhood, but it is not unusual to find the stages of life divided into infancy, childhood, youth, and manhood.

3. A young person, almost invariably a young man. In this case it takes a plural.

4. Young persons generally or collectively.

"[He] bends his sturdy back to any toy,
That youth takes pleasure in, to please his boy."
Cowper: Tirocinium, 649.

*5. Freshness; novelty.

"The youth of my new interest here."

Shakesp.: Merchant of Venice, iii. 2.

youth-ede, *youth-eed, s. [Eng. youth, and hede=head.] Youth; playfulness.

yoüth'-fūl, *yoüth'-fūll, a. [Eng. youth, and full.]

ŷ-slāked', pa. par. [SLAKE.] Slaked, abated, silenced, quieted.

ŷt'-tēr-bīte, s. [After Ytterby, Sweden, where first found in distinct crystals; suff. -ite (Min.).]

Min.: The same as GADOLINITE (q. v.).

ŷt'-tēr-ite, s. [YTTERBITE.]

Min.: The same as TENERITE (q. v.).

ŷt'-trī-ā, s. [YTTRIUM.]

Chem.: [YTTRIUM-OXIDE.]

ŷt'-trī-ōūs, a. [YTTRIUM.] Of or pertaining to yttria; containing yttria.

ŷt'-trī-ūm, s. [Latinized from Ytterby, a town in Sweden.]

Chemistry: A dyad earth-metal, symbol Y, atomic weight 61.7, existing, together with erbium, as a silicate in gadolinite. It is obtained in the metallic state by digesting the mineral with hydrochloric acid, precipitating with oxalic acid, dissolving the oxalates formed in nitric acid, and separating by a series of fractional crystallizations; the erbium salt, being the less soluble of the two, crystallizing out first. On converting the nitrate into a chloride, and igniting with potassium, the metal is obtained as a blackish-gray powder, consisting of small, metallic, lustrous scales. It unites directly, at high temperatures, with chlorine, oxygen and sulphur, and probably with other metalloids.

yttrium-carbonate, s. [TENERITE.]

yttrium-garnet, s.

Min.: A variety of garnet occurring in Norway, containing, according to Bergemann, sometimes as much as 6.66 per cent. of yttria.

yttrium-oxide, s.

Chem.: YO. Yttria. A soft white powder, obtained by igniting the oxalate. When boiled in hydrochloric, nitric, or sulphuric acids, it dissolves slowly but completely, forming colorless salts, and, when ignited, it glows with a pure whiteness.

yttrium-phosphate, s. [XENOTIME.]

ŷt'-trō-, pref. [YTTRIUM.] Containing or resembling yttrium (q. v.).

ŷt'-trō-cāl'-cīte, s. [Pref. yttrō-, and Eng. calcite.]

Min.: The same as YTTROCERITE (q. v.).

ŷt'-trō-çēr'-ite, subst. [Prefix yttrō-, and Eng. cerite.]

Min.: A mineral occurring, associated with albite and topaz, at various places near Fahlun, Sweden; lately found at a few localities in the United States.

bōil, bōy; pōut, jōwl; cat, çell, chorus, çhin, bench; go, gem; thin, ðis; sin, aș; expect, Xenophon, exist. ph = f. -cian, -tian = șan. -tion, -sion = șhñ; ðion, -șion = zhñ. -tious, -cious, -sious = șhš. -ble, -dle, &c. = bēl, dēl.

Hardness, 4-5; specific gravity, 3.447; luster, vitreous to pearly; color, violet-blue shading to white. Composition: Variable, consisting of the fluorides of calcium, cerium, and yttrium.

ŷt-trō-cō-lūm'-bite, s. [Pref. yttro-, and Eng. columbite.]

Min.: The same as YTTROTANTALITE (q. v.).

ŷt-trō-gūm'-mīte, s. [Pref. yttro-, and English gummite.]

Min.: A mineral found associated with cleveite (of which it is probably a decomposition product), near Arendal, Norway. Hardness, 5.0; luster, brilliant; color, black to yellow; translucent; fracture, conchoidal. Composition: A hydrated oxide of yttrium and uranium.

ŷt-trō-īl'-mēn'-ite, s. [Pref. yttro-, and English ilmeneite.]

Mineralogy:

1. A variety of yttrotantalite in which Hermann supposed he had found a new element, his ilmeneium.

2. The same as SAMARSKITE (q. v.).

ŷt-trō-tān'-ta'-lite, s. [Pref. yttro-, and English tantalite.]

Mineral.: An orthorhombic mineral occurring in crystals and massive, in felspar and quartz, at Ytterby and Fahlun, Sweden. Hardness, 5-5.5; specific gravity, 5.4-5.9; luster, vitreous to greasy; color, black, brown, shades of yellow; opaque to subtranslucent; fracture, conchoidal. Composition: A tantalate of yttria and lime, with sometimes iron and protoxide of uranium, a mean of several analyses yielding tantalic acid, 62.5; yttria, 22.6; lime, 5.2; protoxide of iron, 3.4; protoxide of uranium, 6.3=100, which corresponds to the formula $10(\text{YO}, \text{FeO}, \text{CaO}, \text{UO})3\text{TaO}_5$.

ŷt-trō-tī-tān'-ite, s. [Pref. yttro-, and English titanite.]

Min.: The same as KEILHAUTE (q. v.).

yā, s. [See def.] The Chinese name for nephrite or jade (q. v.).

yūc'-ca, s. [The Peruvian name of one species of the genus.]

Bot.: Adam's Needle; a liliaceous genus doubtfully placed under Tulipeæ. Evergreen shrubs, their stem tending to arborescence, crowned by a circle of linear, lanceolate, rigid leaves, from the center of which rises a large panicle of snow-white, whitish-green, or cream-colored flowers. Perianth bell-shaped, its segments without nectaries; stamens clavate, style wanting, fruit capsular, hexagonal, with three cells and numerous flat seeds. From the hotter parts of America. Yucca gloriosa, Common Adam's Needle, has an upright stem, a panicle of flowers three feet long, and a total height in America of ten or twelve feet, Yucca Gloriosa and Flower.

though the cultivated plant in Britain is very much smaller. It is a native of the United States from Carolina to Mexico and Texas. Its fruit is purgative; its stem yields starch and also a fiber well adapted for paper-making. Y. angustifolia and Y. filamentosa have also fibers which may be similarly used. The last-named species, called the Silk grass, has panicles of pendulous cream-colored flowers. It grows in British gardens, blossoming in the autumn.

yūck, v. i. [Dut. jeuken, joken; Low Ger. jöken; Ger. jucken=to itch.] To itch. (Prov.)

yūck, subst. [YUCK, v.] The itch, or scabies. (Prov.)

yūck-ēr, s. [Etym. unknown.] A colloquial name for the golden-winged woodpecker or clape.

yū-ēn, s. [WOODYEN.]

yūfts, s. [Russ. yuft.] A kind of Russian leather, which, when well prepared, is of a good red color, soft and pliable on the surface and pleasant to the touch, with an agreeable, peculiar odor. (Simmonds.)

yū-ga, yoō'-ga, s. [Sansc. yāga, from yuj=to join.]

Hindu Chron.: One of the periods into which the past history of the globe may be divided. There are four yugas: The Satya Yuga, containing 1,728,000 years; the Treta Yuga, 1,296,000; the Dwapara Yuga, 864,000 years; and the Kali Yuga, now in progress, began about B. C. 3094, and which will extend to 432,000 years. Horace Hayman Wilson points out that these numbers originate in the descending arithmetical progressions of 4, 3, 2, 1, according to the notions of diminishing virtue in the several ages applied to a cycle of 12,000 divine years, each equal to 360 years of mortals; and $12,000 \times 360$ is=4,320,000, the periods of the four yugas added together. (Mill: Hist. of Brit. India (ed. 4th), i. 155-157.)

yā'-lan, s. [Chinese (?).]

Bot.: Magnolia conspicua (= M. yulan), a tree, a native of China, where it is forty or fifty feet high, though in Europe and America but twenty or twenty-five. It has large, brilliant snow-white flowers, shining forth from gray and naked branches early in spring before the leaves appear.

yūle, yole, s. [A. S. iula, geōla; geol, gehhol, gehhel; cogn. with Icel. jól; Dan. jul; Sw. jul.] A word of doubtful origin. Skeat prefers the solution given by Fick, viz., that yule=noise or outcry, and especially the loud sound of revelry and rejoicing; cf. Mid. Eng. goulen, gollen=to lament loudly; Eng. yawl (v.); A. S. gylan=to make merry, to keep festival; Icel. gla=to howl, make a noise; Ger. jolen, johlen, jodeln=to sing in a high-pitched voice. From this word comes (through the French) jolly (q. v.). The old English, and still, to some extent, the Scotch and Northern name for Christmas, or the Feast of the Nativity of Our Lord.

"Sitting at their banquet on the twelfth day in Christmas, otherwise called yule."—Holinshead: Hist. Scotland (an. 1219).

yule-block, s. A yule-log (q. v.).

yule-log, s. A large log of wood, often a tree-root, forming the basis of a Christmas fire in the olden time.

yule-tide, s. The season or time of Christmas; Christmas.

ŷ-ūn'-gī-dæ, s. pl. [Modern Latin yunx, genit. yunx(is); Lat. fem. pl. adj. suff. -idæ.]

Ornith.: A family of Picarian birds, with one genus, lunx or Yunx (q. v.).

ŷ-ūnx, ī-ūnx, subst. [Lat. lynx, iunx, from Gr. lynx=the wryneck (q. v.).]

Ornith.: A genus of Picedæ (sometimes raised to the rank of a family, Yungidæ), with five species, characteristic of the Palearctic region, but extending into North and East Africa, over the greater part of India (but not to Ceylon), and just reaching the lower ranges of the Himalayas. There is also one species isolated in South Africa. Beak shorter than head, hard, straight, nearly conical, sharp at tip; nostrils basal, linear, closed by a membrane; tongue protrusile, with smooth, horny tip; wings moderate, tail somewhat rounded; tarsi strong, slightly feathered in front above; two toes before and two behind; claws much hooked, grooved, and very sharp. The name of the genus should probably be lunx, but the misspelling of Linnæus (Syst. Nat., ed. 12th, i. 172) has been followed by the majority of authors, though now there is a tendency to revert to the correct spelling.

yā'-pōn, s. [YAPON.]

yūrt, subst. [Native name.] The name given to houses or tents, whether permanent or movable, used by the natives of Northern Asia or Siberia.

yūx, s. [YEX, YOXE.] A hiccup or hiccup.

yūx, v. i. [YUX, s.] To hiccup or hiccup.

y-ve, s. [IVY.]

y-vel, s. & adv. [EVIL.]

y-voire, s. [IVORY.]

ŷ-wīs, adv. [A. S. gewiss, gewis=certain, sure; cogn. with Dut. gewis; Ger. gewiss=certainly. [Wis.] Certainly, verily, truly.

y-wrake, y-wroke, pret. & pa. par. of verb. [WREAK, v.]

y-wrie, pa. par. [A. S. wreón.] [WRIE.] Covered.

THE last letter of the English alphabet, is a sibilant consonant, and is merely a vocal or sonant s, having exactly the same sound as s in please, ease, wise, &c. The words in modern English which begin with z are all derived from other languages, principally from Greek. It was not known in the oldest English. When not initial, it frequently represents an older s, as dizzy=A. S. dysig, freeze=A. S. freosan, &c. It also stands for a French c or s, as in hazard, lizard, buzzard, seize. Z has intruded into citizen=Fr. citoyen; and it has changed into g in ginger=Lat. zingiberi. As a final it occurs in some onomatopoeic words, as in buzz, whizz, &c.

In German it is very common, being a double consonant with the sound of ts; and similarly in Greek it was also a double consonant, representing the sounds of ds or sd. In Britain it is called zed; in America, zed, or zee.

za, s. [From the sound.]

Music: The seventh harmonic, as heard in the horn or Æolian string. It corresponds to B flat.

zā'-ba-īsm, zā'-bīsm, s. [SABIANISM.]

zā'-bī-ān, a. & s. [SABIAN.]

zā'-brūs, s. [Gr. zabros=voracious. (Agassiz.)]

Entom.: A genus of Carabidæ, sub-family Pterostichinæ. Zabrus gibbus is a broadly oblong beetle of dark-bronze hue, abundant in parts of the continent.

zā-bu-cā'-jō, s. [Native name.]

zabucajo-nuts, s. pl.

Bot. &c. (pl.): The fruit of Lecythis zabucajo, a South American plant. The nuts, two inches long and one broad, enclosed in urn-like fruits, are imported into other countries and eaten. [SAPU-CAJA.]

Zāc'-chē-an, s. [See def.]

Church Hist. (pl.): A local name for the Gnostics, mentioned by Epiphanius, but without adding where they were so called. Probably from some leader named Zaccheus.

zā-çin'-thā, zā-çyn'-thā, s. [Lat. Zacinthus=Zante, the island in which the genus was first found.]

Bot.: A genus of Lactuceæ, with only one known species, Zacintha verrucosa, an annual, with divided leaves; an involucre, becoming fleshy; the inner scales folded, the outer membranous; pappus hairy; achenes flattened, wingless. The plant is used in the Mediterranean countries as a phagædonic.

zādd, s. [An Abyssinian name of the tree described.]

Bot.: Juniperus procera, one of the largest trees in Abyssinia, producing a hard and durable wood much employed in that country for building purposes.

zāf'-fre (re as ēr), zāf'-far, zāf'-fir, zāph'-a-rā, s. [The word is probably of Arabic origin; Fr. & Sp. zafre; Ger. zaffir.]

Chem.: An impure basic arsenate of cobalt, prepared by roasting speiss-cobalt. It is employed in painting on glass and porcelain, for which purpose it must be free from iron. [COBALT.]

zā'-īm, s. [Turk.] A Turkish chief or leader.

zā'-ī-mēt, subst. [Turk.] An estate; a district from which a zaim draws his revenue.

zā'-lā, s. [BORAX.]

zā-lāc'-cā, subst. [Latinized from its Javanese name salrak.]

Bot.: A genus of Pinnated Calameæ. Stemless palms with spines on the sheathing petioles; dioecious flowers with many spathes; the males in pairs, and the female solitary, both surrounded by bracts; fruit armed with overlapping scales, with two or three seeds encased in a fleshy covering. Species, six or seven, natives of Burmah, Assam, Malacca, &c., where they grow in moist places in dense masses, constituting nearly impenetrable thickets. The pulpy covering of the seeds is eaten by the Burmese, and the plant, in consequence, is sometimes cultivated.

zāl'-ō-phūs, s. [Gr. za-, intensive, and lophos=a crest.]

Zoöl.: A genus of Otariidæ, with two species, from the North Pacific and the shores of Australia and New Zealand. Separated from Otaria (q. v.) by some authors on account of the great skull-crest.

zā-māng', s. [Native name.]

Bot.: Pithecolobium saman, an immense tree, with a top some hundred feet in circumference, growing in Venezuela.

zām'-bō, s. [Sp.=bandy-legged . . . a zambo.] The child of a mulatto and a negro, also sometimes of an Indian and a negro. Also written Sambo.

Zām-bō-nī, s. [Giuseppe Zamboni, an Italian physician and medical author (1776-1846), who, in conjunction with De Luc, invented the pile which bears the name of the former.] (See compound.)

Zamboni's pile, s.

Elect.: A dry voltaic pile or battery invented by Zamboni. Paper silvered on one side is damped and coated on the other with manganese dioxide; half a dozen of these sheets being superposed to save time, discs are punched out, and 1,000 to 2,000 single sheets are compressed in a glass tube with metal caps and knobs at the ends. Such a pile retains its activity for years, and will charge a Leyden jar, though it will not give shocks or sparks.

fāte, fāt, fāre, amidst, whāt, fāll, father; wē, wēt, hēre, camēl, hēr, thēre; pine, pīt, sīre, sīr, marine; gō, pōt, or, wōre, wōlf, wōrk, whō, sōn; mūte, cūb, cūre, unite, cūr, rāle, fūll; trȳ, Sȳrian. æ, œ = ē; ey = ā. qu = kw.

zā'-mī-ā, subst. [Lat.=a pine cone, which, when suffered to decay upon the tree, injured the succeeding crop (Pliny), hence applied by Linnæus to this genus, in allusion to the sterile appearance of the male fructification; Gr. zēmia=loss, damage.]

Bot.: A genus of Cycadaceæ. Trees of moderate size, with trunk, the woody tissue of which has its tubes marked by circular discs. The stem is terminated above by a single bud, which ultimately opens into a circle of leaves, usually thick, and pinnatifid with spiny margins. The veneration is gyrate. The flowers, which are dioecious, are in tessellated catkins; the males having abrupt scales, with the oval anthers sessile beneath them; the females with peltate scales, each with two seeds. The fruit is drupaceous. In aspect the species partly resemble palms, and partly tree-ferns; in affinity they are nearer the latter than the former, but rise considerably above them in organization. Natives of tropical America, tropical Asia, the Cape of Good Hope, and Australia. Zamia caffra is the Bread-tree Zamia. It is six or seven feet high, and is a native of southeastern Africa, where the Caffres and the Hottentots make cakes of the pith after it has putrefied. Z. spiralis has many smooth leaflets, with a few spines at the tip. It grows in Australia, where the natives eat the fruit. The stems of Z. tenuis and Z. furfuracea, and the seeds of Z. pumila, in the West Indies, yield arrowroot.

zām-in-dar', s. [ZEMINDAR.]

zā-mī-ōs'-trō-būs, s. [Lat. zamia (q. v.), and Gr. strobos=a top.]

Palæobot.: A genus of Cycadaceæ. One species occurs in the British Jurassic rocks, one in the Wealden, and there are two from the Upper Green-sand. (Etheridge.)

†zā'-mīte, s. [ZAMITES.]

Palæobot.: Any individual of the genus Zamites.

zā-mī'-tēs, s. [Lat. zamia (q. v.); suff. -ites.]

Palæobot.: A genus of Cycadaceæ, akin to the recent Zamia. In Britain, from the Rhætic to the Lower Jurassic. (Etheridge.) A species also exists in the Miocene flora of the Arctic regions.

zā-môuse', s. [Native name.]

Zoöl.: Bos brachycerus, from the tropical parts of Western Africa, known at Sierra Leone as the Bush Cow. Color pale chestnut, hair thin and nearly erect; forehead flatter than in other buffaloes; horns short, sharp, wide apart at base, extending outward and upward, then suddenly incurving; ears very large, with three rows of long hairs springing from the inside, and a tuft of long hairs at the tip; dewlap entirely absent.

zampogna (as dzam-pō'-nya), s. [Ital.]

Music:

1. The Italian bagpipes.

2. A rough-toned reed instrument shaped like a ageolet.

zām'-tīte, s. [See def.]

Min.: A misprint for Zaratite (q. v.).

zān'-clūs, s. [Gr. zangklē=a reaping-hook.]

1. Ichthy.: A genus of Carangidæ, from the Pacific Ocean. Body much compressed and elevated; one dorsal, with seven spines, the third of which is greatly elongated; no teeth on palate; scales minute, velvety. There is but one species, Zanclus cornutus, easily recognized by its long snout and by the broad bands crossing the yellow ground-color. It is about eight inches long, and undergoes various changes in its development.

2. Palæont.: From the Eocene of Monte Bolca.

zand, s. [ZEND.]

zānd'-mōle, s. [Dut.] [SAND-MOLE.]

zān-ja (as thān'-ha), s. [Span.] A ditch for irrigation purposes.

zān-je-ro (as thān-hê'-rō), s. [Sp.] One who has charge of an irrigation system.

zān-nī-chēl'-lī-ā, s. [Named after John Jerome Zannichelli, a Venetian apothecary and botanist (1662-1729).]

Bot.: Horned Pond-weed, a genus of Naiadaceæ. Water-plants with submerged, linear leaves and minute flowers, generally monœcious. Barren flowers, with the perianth wanting, and a solitary stamen with a two to four celled anther. Fertile flowers with a perianth of one leaf, four or more stamens, an elongated, undivided style, a peltate stigma, and nearly sessile achenes. Known species, one or more, from temperate and tropical climes. If only one species exists it is Zannichellia palustris, the Common Horned Pond-weed, which floats in ditches and stagnant waters.

zā-nō'-nī-ā, subst. [Named after James Zanoni, superintendent of the Botanical Garden at Bologna, and author of a work on plants published in 1673. He died in 1682.]

Bot.: A genus of Nandirobææ. Climbing plants with cordate leaves, their axils bearing tendrils with clusters of dioecious flowers. The males have a three-lobed calyx, a rotate corolla with the limb five-parted, and five stamens with one-celled anthers. Female with three styles, and a three-celled ovary developing into a fleshy fruit. The leaves of Zanonia indica, beaten up with milk and butter, are applied as a liniment in antispasmodic affections. They are also used in baths in nervous diseases.

zān'-tē, s. [See def.] A golden-yellow species of sumach from the island of Zante, in the Mediterranean, used for dyeing. Called also Young Fustic, and Fustet.

Zoölogy: The type-genus of Zapodidæ (q. v.). [JACULUS, MERIONES.]

Zar-ā-thūs'-trīc, Zar-ā-thūs'-trī-ān, a. [For etym. see def. and extract.] Of or belonging to Zarathustra, more often corrupted into Zoroaster. [ZOROASTRIAN.]

"It cannot be denied that the Zarathustrian dogmas are pure old Aryan myths in a new shape . . . but it was doubtless a reformer, or, if Zarathustra was no historical person, a body of reformers who called the Zarathustrian religion into existence."—Encyc. Brit. (ed. 9th), xx. 361.

Zar-ā-thūs'-trīsm, s. [ZARATHUSTRIC.]

Compar. Relig.: Zoroastrianism (q. v.).

"Through the great Aryan religious systems, Brahmanism, Zarathustrism, Buddhism, and onward into the range of Islam and of Christianity, subterranean hells of purgatory or punishment make doleful contrasts to heavens of light and glory."—Tylor: Prim. Cult. (1873), ii. 68.

zā'-rā-tīte, s. [After Señor Zarate, of Spain; suff. -ite (Min.).]

Mineral.: A mineral occurring as an encrustation on magnetite and chromite. Hardness, 3-3.25; specific gravity, 2.57-2.693; luster vitreous; color, emerald green; transparent to translucent. Composition: Carbonic acid, 11.7; oxide of nickel, 59.4; water, 28.9=100, which is equivalent to the formula NiOCO₂+2NiOHO+4HO.

zā-reē'-bā, s. [ZERIBA.]

Zāu'-rāc, s. [Corrupted Arabic.]

Astron.: A fixed star, between the second and third magnitude. Called also Gamma Eridani.

zāwn, s. [Cf. Yane.]

Mining: A cavern.

zāx, s. [A. S. seax; Icel. sax=a knife or short sword; O. H. Ger. saks.] A slater's hatchet, with a sharp point on the pole, for perforating the slate to receive the pin. The zax is about sixteen inches long and two in width; it is somewhat bent at one end, and the spur is three inches long.

zā'-yāt, s. [Native name.] In Burmah a public shed or portico for the accommodation of travelers, loungers, and worshipers, found in every Burmese village, and attached to many pagodas. (H. Yule.)

z'-crānk, s. [From its zigzag form.]

Mach.: A peculiarly shaped crank in the cylinder of some marine steam-engines. (Simmonds.)

zē'-ā, s. [Lat., from Gr. zea, zeia=spelt or some other common cereal. The name occurs in Homer.]

Botany: Maize; a genus of Phalarææ. Flowers monœcious; males in terminal racemes, having two-flowered spikelets, and nearly equal sharp-pointed glumes; pales two, fleshy; females axillary in the sheaths of the leaves. Species five: Zea mays is the maize (q. v.); Z. curagua, the Chili maize or Valparaiso corn, which is smaller than the last. Besides the use of the maize as food, it yields a fiber capable of being spun into flax, made into yarn, and used as material for paper-making.

zē-āg'-ōn-ite, s. [Gr. zeō=to cook, to boil; agos=unfruitful, barren, and suff. -ite (Min.).]

Mineralogy:

1. A variety of zircon (q. v.), found in pale bluish octahedral crystals in the ejected rhyacolite bombs of the agglomerates of Monte Somma, Vesuvius.

2. The same as GISMONDITE (q. v.).

zēal, zeale, zele, s. [Fr. zèle, from Lat. zelum, accus. of zelus=zeal, from Gr. zēlos=zeal, ardor, fervor, lit.=heat, from the same root as zeō=to boil, and Eng. yeast.] [JEALOUS.]

"Zeal is the pious madness of the mind."

Dryden: Tyrannic Love, i. 1.

*2. A zealot. (Ben Jonson.)

zēal, v. i. [ZEAL, s.] To be zealous; to entertain zeal.

"Stiff followers, such as zeal marvelously for those whom they have chosen for their masters."—Bacon: On the Con. of the Church of England.

zēal'-ant, s. [Eng. zeal; -ant.] A zealot.

"To certain zealants all speech of pacification is odious."—Bacon. (Todd.)

zēaled, a. [Eng. zeal; -ed.] Filled with zeal characterized by zeal.

"You might have done, but for that zealed religion

You women bear to swooning."

Beaum. & Flet.: Love's Pilgrimage, iv. 2.

zēal'-fūl, zēal'-fūll, adj. [Eng. zeal; -full.] Full of zeal; zealous, enthusiastic.

"In zealfull knowledge of the Truth divine."

Sylvester: The Decay, 482.

zēal'-lēss, zeale-lesse, a. [Eng. zeal; -less.] Destitute of zeal; wanting in zeal.

"We are not patient, but zealelesse."—Bp. Hall: Cont.; Mephibosheth and Zibra.

zēal'-ōt, s. [Fr. zélote=jealous, zealous, from Lat. zelotes.] [ZEAL, s.]

1. One who is zealous or full of zeal; one carried away by excess of zeal; a fanatical partisan. It is generally applied in dispraise or used of one whose zeal or ardor is intemperate or censurable; a fanatic.

"He was in truth not a man to be popular with the vindictive zealots."—Macaulay: Hist. Eng., ch. xiv.

2. One of a fanatical Jewish sect which struggled desperately against the Romans from about A. D. 6 till the fall of Jerusalem.

zēa-lōt'-īc-āl, zē-lōt'-īc-āl, a. [Eng. zealot; -ical.] Ardently zealous.

"Dr. Marshall, dean of Christ Church, a most furious and zelotical man."—Strype: Life of Cranmer, ch. xix.

zēal'-ōt-izm, subst. [Eng. zealot; -ism.] The character or conduct of a zealot.

zēal'-ōt-ist, *zēl'-ōt-ist, s. [Eng. zealot; -ist.] A zealot.

"I could wish these sciolous zealotists had more judgment joined with their zeal."—Howell: Letters.

zēal'-ōt-rŷ, s. [Eng. zealot; -ry.] The conduct or behavior of a zealot; excessive or undue zeal; fanaticism.

"Inquisitorial cruelty and party zealotry."—Coleridge.

zēal'-ōus, *zel-ous, adj. [English zeal; -ous.] [JEALOUS.]

1. Inspired with zeal; ardent in the pursuit of an object; enthusiastic.

"I love to see a man zealous in a good matter."—Addison: Spectator, No. 185.

*2. Sometimes, though rarely, used in a bad sense.

"The zealous and facetious Presbyter, Novatus."—Gauden: Tears of the Church, p. 100.

*3. Full of religious or pious zeal; pious; religious. (Shakesp.: Richard III., iii. 7.)

4. Characterized by zeal, ardor, or enthusiasm; ardent.

"She was empassioned at that pitiuous act,
With zealous envy of Greekes cruell fact."
Spenser: F. Q., III. ix. 38.

zēal'-ōus-lŷ, adv. [Eng. zealously; -ly.]

1. In a zealous manner; with zeal, ardor, or enthusiasm.

"The Indians all offered very zealously to assist us against him."—Cook: First Voyage, bk. i., ch. xvi.

*2. Religiously; with religious or pious zeal. (Milton.) zēal'-ōus-nēss, s. [Eng. zealous; -ness.] The quality or state of being zealous; zeal, ardor, enthusiasm, fervor.

"The zealousness of our endeavors, and the applause that others entertain them with."—Boyle: Works, i. 296.

zē'-bēc, zē'-bēck, s. [XEBEC.]

zē'-brā, subst. [The native name; according to Littré the word was originally Ethiopian.]

Zoölogy:

1. A popular name for any of the striped forms of the genus Equus; thus embracing the Quagga (q. v.), the True Zebra, and Burchell's Zebra. [2.] In all three the external characters are those of the Ass rather than of the Horse; the legs are without warts, the tail is furnished with long hairs only toward the extremity, the neck is full and arched, and the mane stiff and erect. All the species of this division are rapidly vanishing before advancing civilization, and in all probability will become extinct before very many years.

"This family [Equidæ] comprises the Horses, Asses, and Zebras."—Nicholson: Zoölogy (ed. 1878), p. 668.

2. Equus zebra, from the mountainous regions of South Africa. It stands about four feet and a half at the shoulder; ground tint white, with black stripes, vertical on body and horizontal on legs; limbs slender, head light, ears long and open. The zebra lives in small herds in secluded spots; its sense of hearing, sight, and smell is extremely acute, and on the least alarm the whole herd scampers off. When compelled to defend themselves zebras form a compact body with their heads in the center and their heels outward, and have been known to beat off the leopard with their kicks. The zebra has been domesticated, but its vicious temper renders it of little value as a beast of burden. Burchell's Zebra (Equus burchellii) differs little from the True Zebra, except in the fact that the ground tint is yellow.

"He who attributes the white and dark vertical stripes on the flanks of various antelopes to this process [sexual selection], will probably extend the same view to the Royal Tiger and the beautiful zebra."—Darwin: Descent of Man, ch. xviii.

Bot.: Calathea zebrina. So named because the leaves have alternately dark and green stripes.

zebra-poison, s.

Botany: Euphorbia arborea, a South African tree.

zebra-shark, s. [TIGER-SHARK.]

zebra-wolf, †zebra-opossum, s.

Zoöl.: A popular name given by the early colonists of Van Diemen's Land to Thylacinus cynocephalus, from the stripes on its body and its general dog-like appearance. [THYLACINUS.]

Botany and Commerce:

1. A kind of wood, imported from South America, and used by cabinet-makers, produced by Omphalobium lamberti, a large tree belonging to the natural order Connaraceæ, and growing in Guiana. Its colors consist of brown on a white ground, clouded with black, and each strongly contrasted, thus somewhat resembling the skin of a zebra. Called also Pigeon-wood.

2. The wood of Eugenia fragrans, variety cuneata. It is a shrub about eight feet high, growing in Jamaica.

3. The wood of Guettarda speciosa, a tree twenty-five feet high, with scarlet-colored flowers, growing in the East Indies.

zē'-brīne, a. [Eng. zebr(a); suff. -ine.] Of or belonging to the striped division of the genus Equus (q. v.).

zē-brū'-lā, s. A new kind of animal recently produced by crossing the zebra with the horse. It is said to be equal with the mule in size and strength, hardy, docile and of handsome appearance.

zē'-bū, s. [Native name.]

Zoölogy: Any breed or individual of Bos indicus (which by some authorities is considered a variety of Bos taurus, the Common Ox). The Zebu attain their greatest development in India, but range eastward to Japan and westward to the River Niger. They vary greatly in size, some being larger than European cattle, while others are no bigger than a month-old calf. The horns differ in form; the dewlap is more or less developed; one hump is always present over the withers, sometimes there are two; color varying from light ashy-gray to pure white. At present they exist only in a domesticated condition, and must have been early reduced to subjection by man, since all the sculptures of cattle at Elephantia, which are of high antiquity, represent the humped form. In many parts of India zebus are used as beasts of draught and burden, and occasionally for riding. In disposition they are gentle and docile, and are venerated by the Hindus, who consider it a sin to slaughter them, though they do not object to work them. White zebu bulls, which are held particularly sacred by the Hindus, are branded with the image of Siva, relieved from all labor, and allowed to wander at will, levying contributions on the stalls in the bazaars without let or hindrance. Their flesh is inferior to that of the Common Ox, except the hump, which is esteemed a delicacy.

Zoöl.: The humped cattle of the eastern hemisphere.

"In many domesticated quadrupeds, certain characters, apparently not derived through reversion from any wild parent-form, are confined to the males, or are more developed in them than in the females—for instance, the hump on the male zebu-cattle of India."—Darwin: Descent of Man, ch. xviii.

Zēch-a-rī'-ah, Zāch-a-rī'-as, subst. [Hebrew Zekharyah = Zechariah (whom Jehovah remembers); Zakhar=to remember, and Yah=Jehovah: Sept. Zacharias; Vulgate, Zacharius.]

1. Script. Biog.: The name of many ancient Hebrews, including two prophets [2], various priests, and Levites (1 Chron. ix. 21; xv. 24; xxvi. 14; Neh. xii. 35, 41), &c.

vii. 1-viii. 23, dated the fourth day of the ninth month of Darius' fourth regnal year. In the first the prophet counsels a return to Jehovah; in the second, which has in it various symbolic visions, he encourages the building of the temple, and, in answer to a query whether the fasts begun at Babylon should be continued, he directs that they should be transformed into joyous festivals. The style of chapters ix.-xi. differs from that of the first eight; and that of xii.-xiv. to a certain extent from both. In x. 6, the house of Judah requires to be strengthened, as if its government still continued; that of Joseph (the ten tribes) to be saved, as if it were gone; and in verse 11 is the prediction "the pride of Assyria shall be brought down," as if it stood when the words were penned; whereas by the time of Darius Hystaspes it had forever passed away. Some, therefore, assign these chapters to an earlier Zechariah, a contemporary of Isaiah (B. C. about 736). But if the Hebrew Yazari in ix. 13 is correctly translated Greece, this would suggest a date late enough to be consistent with the best-known Zechariah's authorship, if not more recent still. Chaps. xii.-xiv. have been referred to some prophetic contemporary of Jeremiah, B. C. 607 or 606. The date of chaps. i.-viii. is admitted to be B. C. 520-518. Matt. xxvii. 9-10, nominally quoting Jeremiah, seems to refer to Zech. xi. 12-13, and unless Zechariah, the son of Berechiah, of whose death we know nothing, was martyred precisely in the same way as Zechariah, the son of Jehoiada (2 Chron. xxiv. 20, 21), the reference in Matt. xxiii. 35 would seem to be to the latter. Of these difficulties various solutions have been given. Zech. xiii. 7 is quoted by Our Lord as Messianic (Matt. xxvi. 31, Mark xiv. 27). In Matt. xxi. 5, Zech. ix. 9 is regarded as predictive of the entry of Jesus into Jerusalem.

zēch'-in, subst. [Ital. zecchino; Fr. sequin.] A Venetian gold coin, more commonly written sequin (q. v.).

zēch'-stein, subst. [Ger.=mine-stone; zeche=a reckoning, a score, a mine, and stein=stone.]

Geol.: A German subdivision of the Permian, constituting the upper of the two groups, which have sometimes led to that formation being called Dyas (q. v.). It corresponds to the Middle Permian or Magnesian Limestone of Britain. It is wanting in France. Murchison considered it a center of Permian life.

zēd, zēē, s. [Z] The name of the letter z; provincially called also Izzard.

"Thou whoreson zed! thou unnecessary letter!"—Shakesp.: Lear, ii. 2.

zēd'-ō-a-rŷ, s. [From Arab. zedwār; Fr. zédouaire; Prov. zeduari; Port. zeduaria; Ital. zettovario.]

Bot. & Pharm.: The roots of Curcuma zedoaria and C. zerumbet, employed in medicine, and the plants themselves. [CURCUMA.]

zēē'-kōe, s. [Dut.=sea (or lake) cow.] The name given by the Dutch colonists of South Africa to the hippopotamus.

zē'-i-dā, s. pl. [Mod. Lat. ze(us); Lat. fem. pl. adj. suff. -idæe.]

Ichthyology: A lapsed family of Acanthopterygian Fishes.

zēl'-lan-ite, zēy'-lan-ite, s. [O. Ger. Zeilan, Zeylan=Ceylon; suff. -ite (Min.).]

Min.: The same as CEYLONITE (q. v.).

zē'-in, s. [Mod. Lat. ze(a); -in.]

Chem.: A nitrogenous substance obtained from maize flour.

zēl, zēll, s. [Pers.]

Music: An eastern instrument of music of the cymbal kind.

"Where, some hours since, was heard the swell Of trumpet and the clash of zell."

Moore: The Fire Worshipers.

zēl-kō'-na, s. [Native name?] (See etym. and compound.)

zelkona-tree, s.

Bot.: Planera richardi, a North American tree, seventy or eighty feet high, the diameter of the trunk four feet. Leaves like those of the elm, flowers small greenish-yellow, smelling like elder flowers; fruit small, with two seeds.

zēl'-ōt-ist, s. [ZEALOTIST.]

zēl'-ōū-sīe, s. [Gr. zeloō=to emulate, to be jealous of.] Jealousy.

"The zealousie and the eagle feersenes of Olimpias."—Udall: Apoph. of Erasmus, p. 200.

zēm-in-dār, s. [Pers. zemindār=a landholder, from zemīn=land, and dār=holding, a holder.] In India, one of a class of officials created under the Mogul Government of India. They have been regarded, first as district governors, secondly as landed proprietors, and thirdly as farmers or collectors of the government revenue on land. Their functions appear to have been to a great extent fāte, fāt, fāre, amidst, whāt, fāll, father; wē, wēt, hēre, camel, hēr, thēre; pīne, pīt, sīre, sīr, marine; gō, pōt, or, wōre, wōlf, wōrk, whō, sōn; mūte, cūb, cūre, unite, cūr, rāle, fūll; trŷ, Sŷrian. æ, œ = ē; ey = ā. qu = kw.

arbitrary and variable, but founded on and arising out of the last-named office. On the transference of the authority of the Moguls to the East India Company, the zemindars were in general treated as the proprietors of the land. The term is of Persian origin, and the office probably originated with the Mohammedan conquerors of India, who claimed the soil of the country, but, leaving the Indian village tenure intact, set these officers called zemindars over districts comprising each a certain number of villages, the headmen of which accounted to them for the revenues of the land, which they collected with a liberal profit to themselves. At present, in Bengal, the zemindars have all the rights of a British landed proprietor, subject to the payment of the land-tax, and also to a certain ill-defined tenant-right on the part of tenants who have long held possession of their farms.

"It was contemplated that these zemindars would take the place of the landed gentry of European countries, and become leaders in all kinds of agricultural reforms."—Field, Feb. 11, 1888.

zēm'-in-dar-ŷ, zem'-in-dar-eē, zēm'-in-dar-rŷ, a. & s. [ZEMINDAR.]

A. As adj.: Of or pertaining to, or under the jurisdiction of a zemindar; held by a zemindar.

"Under the zemindarry tenure, the land is perpetually assigned by the State, subject to the annual payment of a sum fixed for ever without change."—Field, Feb. 11, 1888.

B. As subst.: The office or jurisdiction of a zemindar; the land possessed by a zemindar.

zēmst'-vō, s. [Russ.] A Russian administrative assembly of nobles and elected delegates of the different classes, held in each province and district.

zē-nā'-l-dā, s. [Ety. not apparent.]

Ornith.: A genus of Columbidae with ten species, founded by Bonaparte. They are distinguished by their stout body, short wings, and long, well-developed legs, and range from Chili and La Plata to Columbia and the Antilles.

zē-na'-nā, subst. [Pers. zenanah=pertaining to women, from zen=a woman.] The name given to the portion of the house reserved exclusively for the females belonging to a family of good caste in India.

"Yet, curiously enough, the ladies to a very large extent avoid the harems, the zenanas, the gynæcea provided for them."—London Daily Telegraph.

zenana-mission, s. A mission founded in 1852 under the auspices of the Protestant missionary societies in India, with the object (1) of sending the gospel to the women of India by means of female missionaries; (2) of alleviating their sufferings in sickness, and ministering to their spiritual need, through the agency of duly qualified female medical missionaries; and (3) of promoting education, based on Holy Scripture, especially among women of the higher classes.

Zēnd, s. [ZEND-AVESTA.]

1. Philol.: An ancient Iranian language in which are composed the sacred writings of the Zoroastrians. It is coeval and cognate with the Vedic Sanskrit. It embraces two dialects, called Bactrian, or Eastern Iranian, and the Western Iranian. The two Zend dialects consist of an earlier and a later, analogous to the Vedic and classic Sanskrit, or to the Homeric and classic Greek. The earlier dialect is called the Gatha, from the Gāthas or sacred songs, which form the only remains of it; the later is that in which the Zend-Avesta, or sacred Zoroastrian writings are found. The present alphabet is comparatively modern, and is probably derived from the Syrian. There are twelve simple vowels, fourteen diphthongs, and twenty-nine consonants, represented by different characters. The roots are mostly monosyllabic, some consisting of only a single vowel, others of a vowel and consonant, or a vowel between two consonants. There are three numbers, singular, dual, and plural, with eight inflections in the first and last, and five in the middle number.

2. Compar. Relig.: A contracted name for the Zend-Avesta (q. v.).

Zend-Avesta, subst. [Prob.=translation or commentary of text with paraphrase, from avesta=text, and zend=translation or commentary.]

Compar. Religion: The sacred books of the Zoroastrians, Magians, Guebers, or Parsees, ascribed to Zoroaster himself, and revered as a bible or rule of faith and practice. They consist of several divisions: The Yazna, a sort of sacrificial ritual, consisting of hymns and prayers, contains the five gāthas in the older dialect; the Visparad is a collection of sacrificial prayers in later Zend. The Yashts are later collections of prayers, consisting of particular invocations of angels, &c., mixed with legends; the Vendidad contains the religious, civil, and criminal code of the Zoroastrians. The immortality of the soul, a future state of rewards and punishments, and the resurrection of the body are taught in the Zend religion.

zēn'-dik, s. [Arab.=an infidel, an atheist.] A name given in the East not only to disbelievers in revealed religion, but also to such as are accused of magical heresy.

zē'-nick, zē'-nik, s. [Native name in parts of Africa.]

Zoöl.: Suricata zenick. [SURICATA.]

zēn'-ith, *sen-yth, s. [Old Fr. cenith (French zenith), from Sp. zenit, zenith, from Arab. samt=a road, a way, a path, a trail, a quarter, whence samt-ar-ras=the zenith, the vertical point of the heavens; as-samt=an azimuth.]

1. Ord. Language & Astron.: The highest point in the heavens to a spectator at any given place, the point from which if the earth were absolutely spherical a perpendicular let fall would pass through its center.

"The sunne passeth twice in the yeere through their zenith over their heads."—Hackluyt: Voyages, iii. 731.

2. Fig.: The highest point of a person's fortune; the highest or culminating point of any subject referred to.

"By my prescience
I find my zenith doth depend upon
A most auspicious star," Shakesp.: Tempest, i. 2.

zenith-distance, subst. The zenith-distance of a heavenly body is the arc intercepted between the body and the zenith, being the same as the co-altitude of the body.

zenith-sector, s. An astronomical instrument, consisting of a telescope swinging upon pivots, and having attached to it an arc graduated into degrees and minutes. From the upper end of the telescope vertically hangs down a fine silver wire, terminated by a weight supported in water to keep it steady. It is used for the same purpose as the mural circle, viz., to ascertain the zenith distance of the several stars, but is more convenient from its greater portability. [MURAL-CIRCLE.]

zenith-telescope, s. The telescope of a zenith sector.

zēn'-ith-al, a. [Eng. zenith; -al.] Of or pertaining to the zenith.

"In order to obtain its zenithal distance."—Airy: Popular Astronomy, p. 34.

zē'-ō-lite, s. [Gr. zeō=to boil, and lithos=stone; Ger. zeolith.]

Mineralogy: A name given to a group of minerals belonging to the hydrous silicates, characterized by much intumescence on the application of heat.

zē'-ō-lith-i-form, a. [Eng. zeolit(e); i connective, and form.] Having the form of zeolite.

zē'-ō-lit-ic, a. [Eng. zeolit(e); -ic.] Of or pertaining to zeolite; consisting of or resembling zeolite.

Zēph-ā-nī'-qāh, s. [Heb. Tsephaniyah=Zephaniah (whom Jehovah has hid); tsaphan=to hide, and Yah=Jehovah; Sept. Sophonias; Vulg. Sophonias.]

1. Scrip. Biog.: A prophet, son of Cushi, who again was the son of Gedaliah, the son of Amariah, the son of Hizkiah (the king?).

2. Old Test. Canon: The ninth in order of the twelve minor prophetic books. Zephaniah prophesied in the reign of Josiah, king of Judah. Josiah, who came to the throne in his eighth year (B. C. 641), tolerated idolatry till the twelfth year of his reign (641-630); next for six years more (630-624) he carried on a partially successful contest against it; then during the remainder of his life (624-610) he made the reformation more sweeping, reestablishing Mosaic institutions throughout the land. When the prophet wrote, the worship of Baal had not quite ceased, nor had other forms of idolatry (Zeph. i. 4-5). His predictions, therefore, seem to have been uttered during the second period, some time between 630 and 624. With this agrees the reference in ch. ii. 12-15 to the impending destruction of Nineveh, which took place in 625. Zephaniah was contemporary with Jeremiah. The first chapter of the book denounces coming judgment, described as the day of the Lord [DAY, C. 3.], on Jerusalem and the Jewish people. The second prophesies the destruction of Gaza, Askalon, and the Philistine cities generally, the Moabites, the Ammonites, and the Assyrian capital Nineveh. The third censures the corruption of Jerusalem, which had affected princes, judges, priests, and prophets, and concludes with promises of future restoration and felicity. The chief characteristics of this book are the unity and harmony of the composition, the grace, energy, and dignity of its style, and the rapid and effective alternations of threats and promises. Its prophetic import is chiefly shown in the accurate predictions of the desolation which has fallen upon each of the nations denounced for their crimes; Ethiopia, which is menaced with a terrible invasion, being alone exempted from the doom of perpetual ruin. The general tone of the last portion is Messianic, but without any specific reference to the Person of our Lord. No serious controversy has ever taken place as to the authenticity of Zephaniah.

Diagram showing Zenith and Nadir.

zē-phar'-ō-vich-ite, s. [After Professor Zepharovich; suff. -ite (Min.).]

Min.: A crystalline to compact mineral found in sandstone at Trenic, Bohemia. Hardness, 5.5; specific gravity, 2.37; color, greenish, yellowish, or grayish-white. Composition: Essentially a hydrated phosphate of alumina, with the probable formula $Al_2O_3PO_5 + 6HO$.

zēph'-ŷr, *zēph'-ŷr-ūs, *zēph'-ŷr, subst. [Fr. zephyre=the west wind, from Lat. zephyrum, accus. of zephyrus=the west wind, from Gr. zephyros, allied to zophos=darkness, gloom, the dark or evening quarter, the west.]

1. Ord. Language (of all forms): The west wind; hence, poetically, any soft, mild, gentle breeze. By the poets Zephyrus was personified and represented as the mildest and gentlest of all the sylvan deities.

"Where sweet myrrhe-breathing zephyr in the spring Gently distills his nectar-dropping showers."
Drayton: Idea 53.

2. Entomology (of the form zephyrus): A genus of Lycenidae, having fore wings with eleven nervures, the subcostal one emitting two branches before the extremity of the discoidal cell, and a bifurcating one beyond. Species few, chiefly from Europe and Asia.

zēr'-dā, s. [A South African word.]

Zoöl.: Sparmann's name for Canis or Megalotis zerda, believed to be identical with the Fennec (q. v.).

zē-rē'-nē, s. [Gr. xerainō=to parch, to dry up. Entom.: The typical genus of Zerenidae.]

zē-rēn'-i-dā, subst. pl. [Mod. Lat. zeren(e); Lat. fem. pl. adj. suff. -idā.]

Entom.: A family of Geometrina. Antennae of the male thick, not pectinated; abdomen in the same sex long; wings broad, entire. Caterpillar short, thick, feeding exposed.

zēr'-ī'-bā, za-reē'-bā, s. [Egypt. zerebak=a thorn hedge.] A word which came into use in the early part of 1884, during the military operations in Egypt, to denote an inclosure the sides of which are formed of prickly brushwood, sheltered by which a force may camp comparatively safe from sudden surprise.

"When the square was broken on the news spread to the zeriba that we were defeated."—Graphic, April 6, 1884, p. 323.

Soldiers making a Xeriba.

zē-rī'-tis, s. [Mod. Lat., formed from Gr. xerainō=to parch, to dry up.]

Entom.: A genus of Lycenidae. Red butterflies with brown borders and metallic spots on the under surface of the hind wings. Natives of Africa.

zēr'-ō, s. [Fr.=a cipher in arithmetic, from Ital. zero, a contracted form of zefiro or ziffo, parallel to zifra=a cipher, from Arab. sifr=a cipher (q. v.). Zero and cipher are doublets.]

1. In common language, zero means no thing; in arithmetic it is called naught, and means no number; in algebra, it stands for no quantity, or for a quantity less than any assignable quantity; a cipher; nothing, denoted by 0.

2. Astronomy: The first point of Aries. [ARIES.] (Prof. Airy: Pop. Astronomy, p. 119.)

3. Therm.: The point (0°) in the scale of a thermometer from which numbers with the + sign are counted upward, and those with the - sign downward. In Fahrenheit's thermometer zero is -32°, i. e., 32 degrees below the freezing point of water. In the Centigrade and Reaumur's scales zero is that freezing point itself.

bōil, bōy; pōut, jōwl; cat, çell, chorus, çhin, bench; go, gem; thin, ðis; sin, aş; expect, Xenophon, exist. ph=f-cian, -tian=shan. -tion, -sion=shūn; -ñion, -ñion=zhūn. -tious, -cious, -sious=shūs. -ble, -dle, &c.=bel, del ¶ Absolute zero: The point at which any given body is supposed to contain no heat. It is -273°C . Temperatures reckoned from it are called absolute temperatures. It is fixed from observation of the fact that a gas is increased $\frac{1}{273}$ part of its volume for every degree of the Centigrade thermometer.

zero-point, subst. The point indicating the commencement of any scale or reckoning.

zero-potential, s. [POTENTIAL, B. 2.]

zest, subst. [O. Fr. zest (Fr. zeste) = a piece of the skin of a citron or lemon, the English sense being due to the use of lemon or citron for flavoring, from Lat. schistos, schistus = divided, from Gr. schistos, from schizō = to divide.]

*1. A piece of orange or lemon peel, used to give a flavor to liquor, or the fine thin oil that squirts out of it when squeezed; also the woody, thick skin quartering the kernel of a walnut.

2. Something which gives a relish or pleasant taste; something which serves to enhance enjoyment; hence, that quality which makes a thing enjoyable; a pleasant taste, a relish.

"Liberality of disposition and conduct gives the highest zest and relish to social intercourse."—Cogan: Ethical Treat., Disc. 1.

3. Relish or keenness of pleasure experienced; keen enjoyment; gusto.

"They joined and partook of the rude fare with the zest of fatigue and youth."—Lytton. (Annandale.)

zest, v. t. [ZEST, s.]

1. To add a zest or relish to.

"When my wine's right, I never care it should be zested."—Cibber: Careless Husband, iii.

2. To cut, as the peel of an orange or lemon, from top to bottom in thin slices, or to squeeze, as peel, over the surface of anything.

zē-tā, s. [Lat. zeta, for dieta = a chamber, a dwelling, from diata = a way of living, mode of life, a dwelling.] A little closet or chamber; applied by some writers to the room over the porch of a Christian church, where the sexton or porter resided, and kept the church documents. (Britton.)

zē-tē-tic, a. & s. [Gr. zētētikos, from zēteō = to seek.]

A. As adj.: Proceeding by inquiry.

B. As subst.: A seeker; a name adopted by some of the Pyrrhonists.

zē-tē-tics, s. [ZETETIC.] A name given to that part of algebra which consists in the direct search after unknown quantities.

zē-tic-ū-lā, s. [Mod. Lat., dimin. from Latin zeta = a drawing-room, a summer-house.] A small withdrawing-room.

zeug'-ite, s. [Gr. zeugitēs = yoked in pairs.]

Min.: An altered variety of Metabrushite (q. v.).

zeug'-lō-dōn, s. [Gr. zeuglō = the strap or loop of the yoke through which the oxen's heads were put; suff. -odon.]

Palæontology:

1. The type-genus of Zeuglodontidae (q. v.). The remains were formerly supposed to be reptilian, and were named Basilosaurus by Harlan. They were renamed by Owen (who demonstrated their Mammalian character), and the new name was chosen because the first section of a molar examined was taken from the base of the crown, where it was beginning to divide into the roots, and thus it looked like two single teeth yoked or linked together. (Trans. Geol. Soc. Lond., ser. ii., vol. vi., p. 67.) The names Phocodon and Phocodontia are sometimes given to the genus and family respectively, from the seal-like character of the dentition. Several species from the Eocene of the United States; a portion of a skull from the Barton Clay (Eocene) of Hampshire, England.

2. Any species or individual of the Zeuglodontia (q. v.).

"The earliest Cetaceans of whose organization we have anything like complete evidence are the Zeuglodons of the Eocene period, which approach in the structure of skull and teeth to a more generalized mammalian type than either of the existing sub-orders. The smallness of the cerebral cavity compared with the jaws and the rest of the skull they share with the primitive forms of many other types."—Encyc. Brit. (ed. 9th), xv. 393.

zeug'-lō-dōnt, a & s. [ZEUGLODONTIA.]

A. As adj.: Of or belonging to the Zeuglodontia.

B. As subst.: Any individual of the Zeuglodontia.

zēug'-lō-dōn-tī-a (or t as sh), zēug'-lō-dōn-tī-dā, s. pl. [Mod. Lat. zeuglodon (genit. zeuglodontis); Lat. neut. pl. adj. suff. -ia, or fem. -idæ.]

Palæont.: A group or family founded to include certain extinct Cetaceans of doubtful affinities, only known by fragmentary remains of Eocene age. In the anterior part of both jaws the teeth are simple, conical, or slightly compressed, and sharp-pointed. Dental formula: $\text{I. } 3-3, \text{C. } 1-1, \text{P. M. and M. } 5-5=36$. Skull elongated and much depressed, brain-cavity very small, strong sagittal crest. The characters of the dorsal vertebrae and the articulation of the ribs appear to have resembled those of Platanista. Huxley considered these animals to have been intermediate between the true Cetaceans and the Seals. By some authorities the group is made to include Zeuglodon (= Phocodon), Squalodon, and Saurocetis. Prof. Flower substitutes for it a sub-order (Archæoceti), and makes the Squalodons a separate family. [SQUALODONTIDÆ.]

zeug'-mā, s. [Greek, from zeugnymi = to join.] [YOKE.]

Gram.: The connection of one word with two words or with two clauses, to both of which it does not equally apply; so that, for one of them, another word (to be gathered from the sense of the passage) must be mentally supplied. Zeugma is therefore a species of ellipsis; both abbreviate discourse. Where the word to be supplied is a form of another in the sentence, as, "I love you, and you [love] me," the construction is elliptical; where the sense requires a different word, as "The sun shall not burn thee by day, neither the moon [injure thee] by night" (Ps. cxxi. 6, Prayer Book), it is zeugma.

zeug-māt'-ic, adj. [ZEUGMA.] Of or pertaining to the figure of speech known as zeugma.

zeun'-ēr-ite (eu as ōi), s. [After Prof. Zeuner, of Freiberg; suff. -ite (Min.).]

Min.: A tetragonal mineral, isomorphous with Uranite, which it much resembles in its physical characters. Hardness, 2-2.5; specific gravity, 3.2; color, grass-green and apple-green. Composition: A hydrated arsenate of sesquioxide of uranium, and protoxide of copper. First found at the Weisser Hirsch mine, Schneeberg, Saxony.

zē-ūs, subst. [Lat., from Gr. zaios = the dory or doree (q. v.).]

1. Ichthy.: A genus of Cyttidæ, with six species, from the Mediterranean, the temperate shores of the Eastern Atlantic, and the coasts of Japan and Australia, all of them in high esteem as food-fishes. A series of bony plates runs along the base of the dorsal and anal fins, and there is another series on the abdomen. The best-known species is Zeus faber, which was well known in classic times. [DORÆ.]

2. Palæont.: From the Miocene of Licata, Sicily.

zeūx'-ite, s. [Gr. zeuxis = a span, a joining; suff. -ite (Min.).]

Min.: A variety of tourmaline (q. v.), found in the United Mines, St. Day, England. Occurred in acicular interlacing crystals of a pale-brown color.

zeū'-zēr-a, s. [Gr. zeugnymi = to join, to yoke.]

Entom.: The typical genus of Zeuzeridæ (q. v.). Antennæ of the male pectinated at the base, the apex filiform; abdomen stout in the male, rather slender in the female.

zeū'-zēr-i-dæ, s. pl. [Modern Latin zeuzer(a); Lat. fem. pl. adj. suff. -idæ.]

Entom.: A family of Bombycina. Antennæ at least as long as the thorax, wings rather distant at the base. Caterpillar naked, with a horny plate on the second segment. It feeds within the stems of trees, reeds, &c.

zeŷ'-lan-ite, s. [ZEILANITE.]

zēŷ'-sōum, s. [An Egyptian word.]

Bot.: The flowerheads of Santolina fragrantissima, sold in the shops of Cairo as a substitute for Camomile.

zīb'-ēt, zīb'-ēth, s. [French zibet; Ital. zibetto; Low Gr. zibeton.] [CIVET.]

Zoöl.: Viverra zibetha, a Sumatran civet. Length about two feet six inches, tail eleven inches; head rounded, bulging before the ears, and then rapidly contracting into a short muzzle; fur close, soft, and downy, with black and white lines on the back, and spots in transverse undulations on the back and sides; tail faintly ringed. In Travancore, in India, there was a government establishment for the rearing of these animals, the civet obtained from them being used in perfumery and in Hindu medicine.

zī-bē-thūm (th as t), s. [ZIBET.] The civet derived from the Zibeth (q. v.).

ziē'-gā, s. [Etym. doubtful.] Curd produced from milk by adding acetic acid, and after rennet has ceased to cause coagulation. (Brande & Cox.)

ziē-trīs-i-kite, s. [After Zietrisika, Moldavia, where found; suff. -ite (Min.).]

Min.: A member of the group of hydrocarbons resembling ozocerite in its physical characters, but differing from that substance in its almost complete insolubility in ether. A mean of three analyses gave: Carbon, 84.64; hydrogen, 14.63.

zīf, zīph, zīv, s. [Heb. ziv, from zachach = to shine, to be beautiful, referring to the splendid appearance of the flowers during the month (Gese-nius); or from Assyrian Giv = the Bull, the constellation Taurus. (Rawlinson: Herod. i. 622.)]

Hebrew Calendar: The second month of the year, extending from the new moon in May to that in June; or, according to some Rabbis, from the new moon in April to that of June, (1 Kings vi. i. 37.) In some copies of the A. V. the spelling is Zif, in others Ziph; in the R. V. Ziv, which is the correct form.

zīf'-fī-ūs, subst. [Etym. doubtful; perhaps for xiphias = the sword-fish.] Some sea monster.

"Huge ziffus whom mariners eschew."

Spenser: F. Q., II. xii. 24.

zīg'-ān'-ka, s. [Russ.]

Music: A dance popular among the Russian peasantry, similar in its figures to the common country dance.

zīg'-ā-rī, s. pl. [ZINGARI.]

zīg'-zāg, a. & s. [Fr., from Ger. zichzach = a zigzag; zichzach, segeln = to tack in sailing; Sw. sichsach = zigzag.]

A. As adjective:

1. Ord. Lang.: Having sharp or quick turns or flexures.

"More zigzag paths tempt us right and left."—Queen, Sept. 26, 1885.

2. Bot.: [FLEXUOUS, 2.]

B. As substantive:

1. Ord. Lang.: Something having short, sharp turns or angles, as a line.

"But that ascent was made by only six zigzags."—Scribner's Magazine, August, 1877, p. 462.

II. Technically:

1. Architecture: A zigzag molding; a chevron or dancette. [See illustration under CHEVRON.]

2. Fort.: One of the trenches leading toward the besieged works, and communicating between the several parallels. It turns to the right and to the left, but with a general curved course, in such a manner as not to be enfiladed by the guns of the fort.

3. A salmon-stair, fish-way, or fish-ladder.

zigzag-molding, s. [CHEVRON, DANCETTE.]

zīg'-zāg, v. t. & i. [ZIGZAG, a.]

A. Trans.: To form with short, sharp turns or angles.

"The middle aisle has on each side four Norman round arches zigzagged."—Warton: History of Kildington, p. 4.

B. Intransitive:

1. To move or advance in a zigzag fashion; to make zigzags.

"He zigzagged back and forth from tuft to tuft."—Scribner's Magazine, July, 1877, p. 284.

2. To waver in or change one's words or opinions. "Speak in ambiguous and hesitating tones, zigzagging this way and that way, and beating about the bush."—London Daily Telegraph.

zīg'-zāg'-gēr-ŷ, s. [Eng. zigzag; -ery.] Zigzag or irregular course.

"When my Uncle Toby discovered the transverse zigzaggy of my father's approach to it."—Sterne: Tristram Shandy, ii. 113.

†zīg'-zāg-gŷ, adj. [Eng. zigzag; -y.] Having sharp turns; zigzag.

"The zigzaggy pattern by Saxons invented Was cleverly chiseled and well represented."—Barham: Ing. Leg.; St. Romwold.

zīl'-lā, subst. [The Egyptian name of Zilla myagroides.]

Bot.: The typical genus of Zillidæ (q. v.). Zilla myagroides is a large glabrous herb, with round white branches, and oblong-toothed leaves, which are boiled and eaten by the Arabs like cabbage. (Loudon.)

zīl'-lāh, s. [Hind.] In Hindustan, a local division of a county; a shire or county.

zīll'-ēr-thite, subst. [After Zillerthal, Tyrol, where found; suff. -ite (Min.).]

Min.: A name given to a bright-green variety of Actinolite (q. v.).

zīl'-lī-dæ, s. pl. [Mod. Lat. zill(a); Lat. fem. pl. adj. suff. -idæ.]

Botany: A family of Orthoplocæ. Silicle indehiscent, sub-globose, one or two celled, each with a single globose seed. Herbs from the Mediterranean region.

zīm'-ā-pān-ite, subst. [After Zimapan, Mexico, where found; suff. -ite (Min.).]

Min.: Stated to be a chloride of iron, crystallizing in the rhombohedral system. A doubtful species.

Tooth of Zeuglodon.

fāte, fāt, fāre, amidst, whāt, fāll, father; wē, wēt, hēre, camel, hēr, thēre; pine, pīt, sīre, sīr, marine; gō, pōt, or, wōre, wōlf, wōrk. whō, sōn; mūte, cūb, cūre, unite, cūr, rūle, fāll; trŷ, Sŷrian. æ, œ = ē; ey = ā. qu = kw.

zimb (b silent), s. [Arab.=a fly.]

Entom.: A dipterous insect described by Bruce as being common in Abyssinia. It is said to resemble the tsetse (q. v.) of the southern parts of Africa, and to be equally hurtful to cattle. It is a little larger than the common bee, and thicker in proportion.

zīm-ënt-wâ-têr, s. [Ger. cementwasser, lit.=cement or cementation water; cf. cementkupfer=copper deposited in water.] A name given to water found in copper mines; water impregnated with copper.

zī-mōc'-ca, s. [Etym. doubtful.] (See etym. and compound.)

Zoöl.: Euspongia zimocca, a sponge with a dark brownish-yellow skeleton, the chief fibers of which are soft, thin, elastic, and almost free from sand, while the under fibers are dense and thick, rendering the sponge itself abnormally hard.

zī'-mōme, s. [ZYMOME.]

zīnc, s. [Dan. & Sw. zink; Fr. zinc; cogn. with Ger. zinn=tin.]

1. Astronomy: It has been ascertained by spectroscopy that there is zinc in the sun.

2. Chem. & Comm.: A divalent metallic element, symbol Zn.; atomic weight, 65; found in considerable abundance in many parts of America, in Britain, in Silesia, and in the neighborhood of Aix la Chapelle. It is extracted from the native carbonate by first roasting the ore, mixing it with charcoal or coke, and subjecting the mixture to a full red heat in an earthen retort. The reduced metal volatilizes, and is condensed by suitable means. It is bluish-white, tarnishes slowly in the air, is crystalline and brittle, with a density varying from 6.8 to 7.2. Between 121° and 149° it has the property of becoming malleable, and after such treatment retains this character when cold. At 411° it melts, and at a bright red heat boils and volatilizes. Ordinary zinc dissolves readily in dilute acids, but pure zinc is less soluble unless it is in contact with platinum, copper, or some other less positive metal, with which it can form a galvanic circuit. Solutions of zinc give a white precipitate with hydric sulphide. In consequence of its lightness and cheapness, sheet zinc is employed for lining baths and cisterns, for gutters, spouts, and roofs; for the latter purpose it is usually corrugated. Zinc plates are much used as generators of electricity in voltaic batteries and in zincography (q. v.). Zinc is also an important factor in the manufacture of alloys, and in the preparation of galvanized iron (q. v.).

3. Pharm.: Oxide of zinc given in small doses is a tonic and astringent, acting beneficially on the nervous system in chorea, epilepsy, hysteria, neuralgia, &c.; in large doses it is emetic; externally it is a desiccant and astringent. Sulphate of zinc and acetate of zinc produce similar effects. So apparently does the carbonate, which, however, is not much employed medicinally. Chloride of zinc is used externally as an escharotic; valerianate of zinc is a nervine tonic and antispasmodic, also an anthelmintic. (Garrod.)

Chem.: The impure gray oxide formed when zinc is heated in contact with air.

zinc-azurite, s.

Min.: A mineral of uncertain composition, said to have been found in small blue crystals in the Sierra Almagrera, Spain. Plattner states that it consists of sulphate of zinc, carbonate of copper and some water. (Dana.)

zinc-butter, s. [ZINC-CHLORIDE.]

zinc-chloride, s.

Chem.: $ZnCl_2$. Zinc-butter. Easily prepared by dissolving the metal in hydrochloric acid. It is a nearly white translucent substance, fusible, and very deliquescent; easily soluble in water and alcohol, and forming a double salt with sal-ammoniac; very useful in tinning and soft soldering copper and iron. It is also useful as an antiseptic, and like sulphuric acid, withdraws the elements of water from organic bodies.

zinc-cyanide, s.

Chem.: $Zn(CN)_2$. A white, insoluble powder, obtained by adding hydrocyanic acid to zinc acetate. It is decomposed by acids with evolution of hydrocyanic acid, but it is soluble in excess of potassic cyanide, the solution yielding on evaporation octahedral crystals of potassic zinc cyanide.

zinc-etching, s. [ZINCOGRAPHY.]

zinc-ethyl, s.

Chem.: $Zn(C_2H_5)_2$. Zinc-ethide. An organometallic compound discovered by Frankland, and formed by heating ethyl iodide with zinc in a sealed glass tube or copper cylinder. The zinc eth-iodide is first formed, which, when distilled in an atmosphere of hydrogen, is resolved into zinc iodide and zinc ethyl. It is a mobile, volatile, and disagreeable smelling liquid, boiling at 118°, and having a specific gravity of 1.182. It takes fire instantly on coming in contact with the air, and water decomposes it violently with formation of zinc hydroxide and ethane ($ZnH_2O_2 + C_2H_6$).

Min.: A variety of Tetrahedrite (q. v.), containing zinc.

zinc-iodide, s.

Chem.: ZnI_2 . Obtained by digesting iodine with excess of zinc and water, till the color of the iodine disappears. It separates in regular octahedral or cubo-octahedral crystals, is very deliquescent, and dissolves easily in water. When heated in contact with the air, it is decomposed, iodine being evolved and zinc oxide produced.

zinc-methide, s. [ZINC-METHYL.]

zinc-methyl, s.

Chemist.: $Zn(CH_3)_2$. Zinc-methide. Prepared in the same manner as zinc-ethyl. It is a colorless mobile liquid, boiling at 46°, and having a specific gravity of 1.386 at 10.5°, and is spontaneously inflammable. These compounds enable us to build up carbon compounds from others lower in the scale. With carbon oxychloride they form ketones, e. g., $COCl_2 + Zn(CH_3)_2 = ZnCl_2 + CO(CH_3)_2$ (acetone).

zinc-oxide, s.

Chem.: ZnO . Zinc white. Prepared by burning zinc in atmospheric air. It is a white, tasteless powder, insoluble in water, but freely soluble in acids, and is employed as a substitute for white lead, especially in paint work that is exposed to the action of the fumes of sulphuretted hydrogen.

zinc-oxychloride, s.

Chem.: $ZnCl_2 \cdot 3ZnO \cdot 4H_2O$. Basic chloride of zinc. Obtained by evaporating to dryness an aqueous solution of zinc chloride. It is a white powder, insoluble in water, and giving off half its combined water when heated to 100°. It is used as a paint for wood, stone, or metal, dries quickly, and is free from odor.

zinc-phyllite, s.

Min.: The same as HOPEITE (q. v.).

zinc-spinel, s.

Min.: The same as AUTOMOLITE (q. v.).

zinc-sulphate, s.

Chem.: $ZnSO_4 \cdot 7H_2O$. White vitriol. Prepared by dissolving the metal in dilute sulphuric acid, or by roasting the native sulphide. Its crystals are hardly to be distinguished by the eye from sulphate of magnesia. It has an astringent metallic taste, dissolves in two and a half parts of cold and a much smaller quantity of hot water, and is chiefly used in calico-printing.

zinc-vitriol, s. [ZINC-SULPHATE.]

zinc-white, s. [ZINC-OXIDE.]

zīnc, v. t. [ZINC, s.] To coat or cover with zinc. [GALVANIZE.]

zīnc-ā-çet'-ā-mīde, s. [Eng. zinc, and acetamide.]

Chem.: $C_4H_8Zn \cdot N_2O_2$. A white powder formed by the action of acetamide on zinc-ethyl.

zīnc-ā-lū'-mīn-īte, s. [Eng. zinc, and aluminumite.]

Min.: A mineral occurring in minute hexagonal plates at the Laurium mines, Greece. Hardness, 2.5 to 3.0; specific gravity, 2.26; color, white. Composition: A hydrated sulphate of alumina and zinc, with the formula $2ZnSO_4 \cdot 4ZnH_2O_2 \cdot 3Al_2H_6O_9 \cdot 5aq.$, which requires, sulphuric acid, 12.48; alumina, 24.12; oxide of zinc, 38.12; water, 25.28=100.

zīnc-ām'-yīl, zīnc-ām'-yīl-īde, s. [Eng. zinc, and amyl; -ide.]

Chem.: $Zn(C_5H_{11})_2$. Zincamylide. A colorless, transparent, mobile liquid, prepared by heating zinc with mercuric amylide. It has a specific gravity of 1.022 at 0°, boils at 220°, but gradually decomposes at 240°, yielding amylene and amyl hydride. In contact with the air it fumes, and, when dropped into oxygen gas, burns with a dazzling white flame and slight explosion.

zīnc-ām'-yīl-īde, s. [ZINCAMYL.]

zīnc'-īc, a. [Eng. zinc; -ic.] Of, or pertaining to, or containing zinc.

zīnc-if'-ēr-oūs, a. [Eng. zinc, s., and Lat. fero=to bear, to produce.] Producing zinc; as, zinciferous ore.

zīnc'-īte, s. [Eng. zinc; suff. -ite (Min.); Ger. zinkit, rothzinkerz; Fr. zinc oxydé.]

Min.: A mineral of sparse occurrence, at present only known to have been found at certain mines in Sussex county, in New Jersey. Crystallization hexagonal; hardness, 4-4.5; specific gravity, 5.43-5.7; luster sub-adamantine; color, deep red, streak, an orange-yellow; translucent to sub-translucent; fracture, sub-conchoidal; brittle. Composition: Oxygen, 19.74; zinc, 80.26=100, whence the formula ZnO .

zīnc'-en-īte, zīnc'-en-īte, subst. [After Herr Zincken, the director of the Anhalt mines; suff. -ite (Min.).]

Mineral.: An orthorhombic mineral, occurring mostly in divergent groups of hexagonal prisms at Wolfsberg, in the Hartz Mountains. Hardness, 3-3.5; specific gravity, 5.30-5.35; luster, metallic; color and streak, steel-gray; opaque. Composition: Sulphur, 22.1; antimony, 42.6; lead, 35.3=100, thus yielding the formula $PbS + Sb_2S_3$.

zīnc'-kŷ, zīnc'-yŷ, adj. [Eng. zinc, s.; -y.] Pertaining to zinc; containing zinc; having the appearance of zinc.

zīncō-, pref. [Eng. zinc, and o connect.] Of or pertaining to zinc (q. v.).

Galv.: A term applied to the surface of the zinc presented to the acid in a battery.

zīnc'-ōde, s. [Eng. zinc, and Gr. hodos=a way.] The positive pole of a galvanic battery.

zīnc'-cō-graph, s. [Eng. zinc, and Gr. graphō=to write, to draw.] A design drawn by zincography (q. v.); an impression taken from such a design.

"Illustrated with full-page tinted zincographs."—Field, Jan. 23, 1886.

zīncōg'-ra-phēr, s. [Eng. zincograph; -er.] One who practices zincography.

zīnc'-cō-grāph'-īc, zīnc'-cō-grāph'-īc-āl, a. [Eng. zincograph(y); -ic, -ical.] Pertaining or relating to zincography.

zīncōg'-ra-phŷ, s. [ZINCOGRAPH.] An art in its essential features similar to lithography, the stone printing-surface of the latter being replaced by that of a plate of polished zinc. The design is drawn on the zinc-plate with a material which resists acid. The surface of the plate being bitten away leaves the design in relief to be printed from by the ordinary mode in printing from woodcuts. The first attempts at zincography were made by H. W. Eberhard, of Magdeburg, in 1805.

zīnc'-ōīd, a. [Eng. zinc; suff. -oid.] Resembling zinc; pertaining to zinc.

zīncōl'-yŷ-sīs, s. [Pref. zīncō-, and Gr. lysis=setting free.]

Elect.: The same as ELECTROLYSIS (q. v.).

zīnc'-cō-lŷte, s. [Pref. zīncō-, and Gr. lytos=that may be dissolved.]

Elect.: The same as ELECTROLYTE (q. v.).

zīnc'-cō-nīne, s. [Eng. zinc; on connect., and suff. -ine (Min.).]

Min.: The same as HYDROZINCITE (q. v.).

zīnc'-cō-nīse, s. [Eng. zinc; o connect., and Gr. konis=powder.]

Min.: The same as HYDROZINCITE (q. v.).

zīnc'-cō-ŷite, zīnc'-kō-ŷite s. [Eng. zinc; os connect., and suff. -ite (Min.).]

Min.: A doubtful mineral, said to be an anhydrous sulphate of zinc, occurring in crystals isomorphous with those of anglesite and barytes.

zīnc'-oūs, a. [Eng. zinc, s.; -ous.] Pertaining to zinc, or to the positive pole of a voltaic battery.

zīnc'-ōx'-yīl, s. [Eng. zinc, s.; ox(ygen), and -yl.]

Chem.: The name given to the diatomic radical, O_2Zn .

zīnc'-dī-kīte, subst. [Anglicized from the Arabic name.]

Mohammedanism (pl.): A heretical sect who believe that the world was produced from four eternal elements, and that man is a microcosm. They disbelieve in God, the resurrection, and a future life. (Brewer.) zīnc'-ga-rī, zīnc'-ga-neē, zīg'-ā-rī, subst. [See extract.] A gypsy (q. v.).

"A remarkably perfect eponymic historical myth accounting for the gypsies or Egyptians may be found cited seriously in 'Blackstone's Commentaries'; when Sultan Selim conquered Egypt in 1517, several of the natives refused to submit to the Turkish yoke, and revolted under one Zinganeus, whence the Turks call them Zinganees, but, being at length surrounded and banished, they agreed to disperse in small parties over the world, &c. &c."—Tylor: Prim. Cult. (ed. 1873) i. 400.

bōil, bōy; pōut, jōwl; cat, çell, chorus, çhin, bench; go, gem; thin, this; sin, aş; expect, Xenophon, exist. ph = f. -cian, -tian = şan. -tion, -sion = şün; -tion, -şion = zhün. -tious, -cious, -sious = şüş. -ble, -dle, &c. = bel, del.

zing'-el (z as dz), s. [Low Ger.]

Ichthy.: A name applied by some writers to any individual or species of the genus Aspro (q. v.). The name is more properly limited to the type-species, Aspro zingel, about a foot long, with a weight of two pounds; back greenish-brown, sides yellowish with a shade of gray, belly whitish, four cloudy brownish-black bands, more or less distinct on sides. Found in the Danube and its larger tributary streams. (Seeley: Freshwater Fishes of Europe.)

zīn'-ghō, s. [ZINC, s.]

zīn'-gī-ān, a. [Etym. doubtful.]

Philol.: A name sometimes given to the South African family of tongues. Called also Bantu and Chuana. A peculiarity of this family is the use of clicks or clicks in speaking. [CLICK, s., A. II. 1.]

zīn'-gī-bēr, s. [Lat. zingiberi, from Gr. zinggi-beris=ginger.]

Bot.: Ginger; the typical genus of Zingiberaceæ. Indian herbs with creeping, jointed, woody root-stocks; leaves in two ranks, sheathing the stem, flowers in conical spikes, inner limbs of the corolla with only one lip, and the anther with a simple recurved horn at the end. Zingiber officinale is the Common Ginger; it is cultivated throughout India. [GINGER.] Z. cassumunar is said to be carminative, like the former species.

zīn'-gī-bēr-ā'-cē-æ, s. pl. [Mod. Lat. zingiber; Lat. fem. pl. adj. suff. -aceæ.]

Bot.: Gingerworts; an order of Endogens, the typical one of the alliance Amomales. Aromatic herbs, with a creeping, often jointed rhizome. Stem simple, formed of the cohering bases of the leaves; leaves simple, sheathing, with a single midrib, from which very numerous parallel veins diverge at an acute angle and proceed to the margin; flowers generally in pairs, and lying among spathaceous bracts; calyx superior, short, tubular, three-lobed; corolla, tubular, irregular, with six segments in two whorls, the inner, morphologically viewed, being transformed sterile stamens, untransformed stamens three, two of them abortive; filament of the former not petaloid; anther, two-celled; style filiform; stigma, dilated, hollow; ovary, more or less perfectly three-celled, with the placenta in the axis; fruit, usually a capsule, three, or sometimes one celled; seeds, many. Closely akin to Marantaceæ, with which they were formerly combined, but differ in their two-celled anther, and in the possession of a vitellus round the embryo. Natives of the East Indies and some other tropical countries. Genera, twenty-nine; species 247. (Lindley.)

zīn'-gī-bēr-ā'-ceōūs, (ce as sh,) a. [Mod. Lat. zingiberace(æ); English adj. suff. -ous.] Of or pertaining to ginger or the Zingiberaceæ (q. v.).

zīn'-nī-ā, s. [Named after John Godfrey Zinn (1727-59), professor of botany at Gottingen.]

Bot.: A genus of Heliopsidæ, with six or seven species. Ray consisting of five persistent florets, fruit crowned by two awns. Elegant American plants. They are cultivated for the beauty of their flowers.

zinnwaldite (as dzīnn'-vāld-ite), subst. [After Zinnwald, Bohemia, where found; suff. -ite (Min.).] Min.: A variety of LEPIDOLITE (q. v.).

zīn'-zī-bēr-ā'-ceous (ce as sh), a. [ZINGIBERACEOUS.]

Zī'-ōn, s. [Heb. tsion=exposed on a sunny place; tsachach=to shine, to glow with heat, to be exposed to the sun.]

1. Lit.: A mount or eminence of Jerusalem, the royal residence of David and his successors.

2. Figuratively:

(1) A dissenting chapel. [BETHEL, 2. (1).]

(2) The theocracy or church of God.

Zī'-ōn-īsm, n. [Eng. Zion; -ism.] A name given to a scheme for the purchase of Palestine from Turkey, with a view to the migration thither of all the Jews in the world, to establish themselves as a nation and once more become a power in the world.

zīph-i'-i-dæ, s. pl. [Mod. Lat. ziphi(us); Lat. fem. pl. adj. suff. -idæ.]

Zoöl.: A family of Cetacea, equivalent to Ziphiinæ (q. v.).

zīph-i'-i-næ, s. pl. [Mod. Lat. ziphi(us); Lat. fem. pl. adj. suff. -inæ.]

Zoöl.: A sub-family of Physeteridæ, with four genera, Hyperoodon, Mesoplodon, Berardius, and Ziphius (q. v.). Teeth of mandible rudimentary, except one or two pairs, which may be largely developed, especially in the males; spiracle single, crescentic; pectoral fin small, ovate, all five digits well developed. They appear to feed chiefly on small cephalopods, and occur singly or in small herds.

zīph-i'-ōid, a. & s. [Mod. Lat. ziphi(us); Eng. suff. -oid.]

fāte, fāt, färe, amidst, whāt, fäll, father; wē, wēt, hēre, camēl, hēr, thēre; pīne, pīt, sīre, sīr, marine; gō, pōt, or, wōre, wōlf, wōrk, whō, sōn; mūte, cūb, cūre, unite, cūr, rāle, fūll; trȳ, Sȳrian. æ, œ = ē; ey = ā. qu = kw.

A. As adj.: Of, belonging to, or resembling the sub-family Ziphiinæ (q. v.).

B. As subst.: Any individual of the Ziphiinæ (q. v.).

zīph'-i-ūs, s. [Mod. Lat., from Gr. xiphos = a straight sword. Named from the pointed snout of the species.]

Zoöl. & Palæont.: A genus of Ziphiinæ (q. v.). Several species have been described, some of them probably under more than one name. The best known is the type Ziphius cavirostris, from the Mediterranean. It was on an imperfect skull of this species, picked up on the Mediterranean coast of France, in 1804, and described by Cuvier, who thought that it belonged to an extinct animal, in his Ossements Fossiles, that the genus was founded. Teeth of this or of an allied species from the Suffolk and Antwerp Crag.

Skull of Ziphius Cavirostris.

zīp'-pē-ite (z as tz), s. [After Prof. Zippe, the mineralogist at Prague; suff. -ite (Min.).]

Mineral.: A mineral occurring as an alteration product of uraninite (q. v.) at Joachimsthal, Bohemia. Acicular, sometimes in rosette-like groups of needles or small botryoidal. Hardness, 3.0; color, shades of yellow. Composition: Essentially a hydrated sulphate of sesquioxide of uranium.

zīr'-carb-ite, s. [English zir(con), carb(onate), and suff. -ite (Min.).]

Mineralogy.: A name given by C. U. Shepard to a doubtful mineral whose chemical composition was undetermined. Stated to have been found with cyrtolite, at the granite quarries of Rockport, Massachusetts.

zīr'-cōn, zīr'-cōn-ite, s. [The Cingalese name.]

Min.: A mineral occurring only in crystals or crystalline grains. Crystallization, tetragonal. Hardness, 7.5; specific gravity, 4.05-4.75; luster, adamantine; color, very variable, shades of red, yellow, brown, green, &c.; translucent to transparent. Composition: Silica, 33.0; zirconia, 67.0=100, hence the formula ZrO_2SiO_2 . Dana adopts the following altered varieties as sub-species: Malacone, Cyrtolite, Tachyphalite, Erstedite, Auerbachite, and Bragite. (See these words.)

zircon-syenite, s.

Petrol.: A variety of Syenite (q. v.), characterized by the presence of zircon in distributed crystals.

zīr'-cōn-ate, s. [Eng. zircon(ic); -ate.]

Chem. (pl.): Compounds of zirconia with the stronger bases.

zīr-cō'-nī-ā, subst. [ZIRCONIUM.] [ZIRCONIUM-OXIDE.]

zirconia-light, s. One in which a stick of oxide of zirconium is exposed to the flame of oxy-hydrogen gas. Invented by Tessié du Motay.

zīr'-cōn'-ic, adj. [Eng. zircon(ium); -ic.] Derived from or containing zirconium.

zirconic-acid, s.

Chem.: Zirconia in combination with bases.

zīr'-cōn-ite, s. [ZIRCON.]

zīr-cō'-nī-ūm, subst. [Mod. Lat., from zircon (q. v.).]

Chem.: A tetratomic element intermediate between aluminium and silicon; symb., Zr.; atomic weight, 90; first obtained from zirconite by Klaproth in 1789. Like silicon, it is capable of existing in three different states, amorphous, crystalline, and graphitoid. The amorphous and crystalline are obtained by processes similar to those described for preparing the corresponding modifications of silicon (q. v.). The graphitoid variety is obtained in light scales of a steel-gray color, by decomposing sodium zirconite with iron. It is but slowly attacked by sulphuric, nitric, or hydrochloric acid, even when heated, but dissolves readily in hydrofluoric acid.

zirconium-chloride, s.

Chem.: $ZrCl_4$. A white crystalline mass prepared by heating zirconium in chlorine gas. When treated with water, it is converted into oxychloride of zirconium, $ZrOCl_2 \cdot 8H_2O$.

zirconium-oxide, s.

Chem.: ZrO_2 . Zirconia. A white, tasteless, inodorous powder, obtained by heating zirconium to redness in contact with the air. It is insoluble in ordinary acids, soluble with difficulty in hydrofluoric acid, but dissolves readily when heated with concentrated sulphuric acid.

zīrl'-ite, subst. [After Zirl, Tyrol, where found; suff. -ite (Min.).]

Min.: A name given by Pichler to an opal-like hydrate of alumina, probably identical with gibbsite (q. v.).

zither, zithern (as tzīt'-ēr, tzīt'-ērn), s. [Ger., from Lat. cithara (q. v.).] [CITTERN.]

Music: A development of the instrument known to the Greeks as cithara (q. v.). In the early part of the nineteenth century it became a favorite with the peasantry of the Styrian and Bavarian Alps and was introduced into England about 1850, chiefly by Herr Curt Schulz. The zither consists of a resonance-box, with a large circular sound-hole near the middle; the strings, thirty-two in number, in some cases increased to forty and even forty-six, being made of steel, brass, catgut, and silk covered with fine silver or copper wire, and tuned by pegs at one end. Five of the strings are stretched over a fretted key-board, and are used to play the melody, the fingers of the left hand stopping the strings on the frets, the right-hand thumb, armed with a metal ring, striking the strings, which are tuned in fifths, and have a chromatic range from c in the second space of the bass staff to d on the sixth ledger line above the treble. The remainder, called the accompaniment strings, are struck by the first three fingers of the right hand, and, as they are not stopped, produce only the single note to which they are tuned. While playing the performer rests the instrument on a table with the key-board side nearest to him. The viola zither, in which the resonance-box is heart-shaped, is tuned like the violin (q. v.), and is played with a bow. The form of the instrument is like that of the viola, but the body rests on the lap of the seated player, while the head is placed on the edge of a table.

zī-zā'-nī-ā, subst. [Lat., from Gr. zizanon=the darnel.]

Bot.: A genus of Oryzæ. A grass with monœcious flowers, the males being above and the females below on the panicle. Males with small, round, membranous glumes and two pales, the inferior one five-nerved and the superior one three-nerved. Females without glumes; pales two, the lower seven-nerved, the upper three-nerved. Known species five. Zizania aquatica is Canada rice. It has a pyramidal panicle of flowers, and is commonly met with in streams in North America, from Canada to Florida. The seeds, which are bland and farinaceous, are largely eaten by the North American Indians, and also support multitudes of wild fowl.

zī'-zēl, s. [SOUSLIK.]

zī'-zē-phūs, s. [Lat., from Gr. zizyphon=the tree whose fruit is the jujube.] [See def.]

1. Bot.: A genus of Rhamnaceæ. Shrubs or small trees, with spiny stipules, alternate three-nerved leaves, a spreading five-cleft calyx, five hood-like petals, five stamens, a five-angled disk, adhering to the tube of the calyx, and having inclosed within it the two to three celled ovary. Fruit berry-like, the stone or kernel with two or three cells, and a single flattened seed in each. Widely distributed, but having their metropolis in the sub-tropical parts of the Eastern hemisphere. The berries of Zizyphus jujuba, the Indian plum, cultivated throughout India and Burmah, are eaten both by Europeans and natives. They are called Jujubes, and are of a mucilaginous, mawkish taste. Z. vulgaris, wild in the Punjab, and cultivated in Bengal, also furnishes some of the jujubes of commerce. The fruits of Z. nummularia, Z. rugosa, and Z. cenoplia are also eaten in India, but are inferior to the genuine jujubes. The fruit of Z. joazeira is eaten like jujubes in Brazil. Z. lotus is by some believed to be the Lote-tree (q. v.) or Lote-bush, the fruit of which produced such effect on the classical Lotophagi (q. v.). It grows in Barbary, where it is called sadr, and its berries, which are collected for food, nabk. The negroes of the Gambia prepare a wine from the fermented berries of Z. orthacanthus. The fruit of Z. nummularia, which grows in India, is considered to be cool and astringent, and it is given in bilious disorders. The bark of Z. jujuba is said to be a remedy for diarrhœa; the root in decoction is given in fever, and, powdered, is applied to sores. In the Himalaya districts the bark is used as a tan and dye-stuff. The bark of Z. xylopyra, a large scrambling shrub found in the hilly parts of India, is also used for tanning and for dyeing black. The root of Z. napeca is given as a remedy in windy colic. Z. jujuba, Z. nummularia, Z. rugosa, and Z. vulgaris, yield a gum. A decoction of the leaves of Z. glabrata is said to purify the blood. The dried fruits of Z. vulgaris are considered suppurative, expectorant, and fitted to purify the blood. The bark is used as an application to wounds and sores. The kernels of Z. soporiferus are regarded by the Chinese as soporific. The bark of Z. joazcira is bitter, astringent, somewhat acrid, and tends to produce sickness. Z. baclei, from the Gambia, is believed to be poisonous.

2. Palæobot.: Two species of Zizyphus are found in the Middle Eocene of England.

zō-, pref. [Zoo.]

zō-ād'-ū-læ, s. pl. [Med. Latin, from Gr. zōē=life, and adēn=a gland.]

Bot.: The locomotive spores of some Conferveæ.

zō-ān-thār'-i-a, s. pl. [Mod. Lat., from zoanthus (q. v.).]

Zoöl. & Palæont.: An order of the class Actinezoa (q. v.), having the chambers and tentacles generally six in number, or constituting some multiple of six, however largely they may be increased. The Zoantharia are divided into three sections, according to the character of the skeletal structure:

1. Zoantharia Malacodermata, containing the Sea-anemones and their allies. There are three families: Actinidæ, Ilyanthidæ, and Zoanthidæ (q. v.). The group is cosmopolitan, and preëminently characteristic of the littoral and laminarian zones, very few forms extending to 500 fathoms, and but one genus being pelagic. They have left no trace in time.

2. Zoantharia Sclerobasica; Black Corals, principally from the warmer seas, but found at various points in the North Atlantic, and recorded from Greenland; depth from four to several hundred fathoms. [CORAL, s., ¶ 1.]

3. Zoantharia Sclerodermata. [MADREPORARIA.]

zō-ān'-thī-dæ, s. pl. [Mod. Latin zoanth(us); Lat. fem. pl. adj. suff. -idæ.]

Zoöl.: The type-family of Zoantharia Malacodermata. Polypes adherent, united by a creeping or crust-like cénosarc, rarely solitary, incapable of locomotion. True corallum absent; a pseudo-skeleton, generally formed by particles of stone or sand embedded in the ectoderm. [ZOANTHUS, EPIZOANTHUS, POLYTHOA.]

zō-ān'-thrō-pý, s. [Pref. zo-, and Gr. anthrōpos=a man.]

Pathol.: A kind of monomania in which the patient believes himself transformed into one of the lower animals. Lycanthropy (q. v.) comes under this head.

zō-ān'-thūs, subst. [Pref. zo-, and Gr. anthos=a flower.]

Zoöl.: The type-genus of Zoanthidæ (q. v.). Body elongated, conic, and pedunculated, springing from a base common to several polypes; mouth linear and transverse, in the center of a disc bordered by short slender tentacula. The sole European species of the genus, Zoanthus couchii, is found on the British coasts.

zō-ar'-çēs, subst. [Gr. zōarkēs=supporting or maintaining life; zōē=life, and arkeō=to support.] Ichthy.: A genus of Blenniidæ, with two species: Zoarces viviparus, the Viviparous Blenny (q. v.), from the European, and Z. anguillaris, from the North American side of the Atlantic. The latter is by far the larger, reaching a length of from two to three feet. Body elongate, with rudimentary scales; conical teeth in jaws; dorsal fin long, with a depression on tail; no separate caudal fin; ventrals short, formed by three or four rays; gill-openings wide.

zō-bō, zō-bū, s. [Native name.]

Zoöl.: (See extract.)

"Among the characteristic animals [of the Tibetan Himalaya] may be named the Yak, from which is reared a cross breed with the ordinary horned cattle of India—locally called zobu."—Encyc. Brit. (ed. 9th) xi. 833.

zōc'-cō, zō'-cle, zōc'-cō-lō, s. [Italian zoccolo, from Lat. soccus=a sock (q. v.).]

Arch.: A Socle (q. v.).

zō-dī-āc, zō-dī-āk*, zo-di-acke*, zo-di-ake*, subst. [Fr. zodiaque, from Lat zodiacus, from Gr. zōdiakos=of or pertaining to animals, whence ho zōdiakos=the zodiac circle, so called from containing the twelve constellations represented by animals, from zōdion=a small animal, dimin. from zōon.] [Zoon.]

*1. Ord. Lang.: A girdle, a belt, a zone.

"By his side,

As in a glistening zodiac, hung his sword."

Milton: P. L., xi. 247.

2. Astron.: The zone or broad belt of constellations which the sun traverses during the year in passing around the ecliptic. The moon and major planets also move within the same area. The breadth of the zodiac is about eight and a half degrees on each side of the ecliptic, or seventeen in all. It is inclined to the equinoctial at an angle of about 23°28', the points of intersection being reached by the sun, one at the vernal and the other at the autumnal equinox. The great circle of the zodiac was divided by the ancients into twelve equal portions called signs. They were named from the constellations then adjacent to them in the following order: Aries, the Ram; Taurus, the Bull; Gemini, the Twins; Cancer, the Crab; Leo, the Lion; Virgo, the Virgin; Libra, the Balance; Scorpio, the Scorpion; Sagittarius, the Archer; Capricornus, the Goat; Aquarius, the Waterbearer; and Pisces, the Fishes. The sun formerly entered Aries on March 20; now, owing to the precession of the equinoxes, the point of the heavens intersected by the celestial equator and the ecliptic, technically called the first point of Aries, has moved well into Pisces.

zō-dī'-ā-cal, a. [Eng. zodiac; -al.] Of or pertaining to the zodiac.

"A philosophical explanation of the zodiacal system."—Warton: Hist. Eng. Poetry, vol. iii.

zodiacal-constellations, s. pl.

Astron.: The twelve constellations from which the signs of the zodiac are named.

Astron.: A pearly glew spreading over a portion of the sky near the point at which the sun is just about to rise in the morning, or has just set in the evening. It extends from the horizon to a considerable distance toward the zenith, and is best seen in the tropics in spring evenings, about the time of the vernal equinox. In the latitude of London it is seen chiefly in the western part of the sky in early spring after the evening twilight, and at the close of autumn before daybreak in the eastern horizon. The generally accepted theory of the zodiacal light is that it consists of a continuous disc, whether of meteors or any other substance, in which the sun is central.

zō-ē'-a, s. [Gr. zōē=life.]

Zoöl.: A pseudo-genus of Crustacea, founded on the larvæ of some of the higher forms. There is a cephalo-thoracic shield, often provided with long spiniform processes, the longest of which project upward from the middle of the back; the tail region is developed, but without appendages; lateral eyes are present in addition to the median eyes.

zoea-stage, s.

Zoöl.: The earliest stage in the development of the higher Crustacea.

zōēb'-litz-ite (initial z as tz), s. [After Zueblitz, Saxony, where found; suff. -ite (Min.).]

Min.: A light yellow massive mineral occurring in serpentine. A hydrated silicate of magnesia; probably an impure talc.

zō-ē-prāx'-i-scōpe, s. [Gr. zōē=life; praxis=action, exercise, and skōpō=to see.] A zoogyroscope (q. v.).

zō-ē-trōpe, s. [Gr. zōē=life, and tropē=a turning.] A mechanical toy, depending, like the thaumatrope, for its interest upon the constancy of visual impressions. It consists of a rotating drum, open at the top, in which, around its inner periphery, are placed strips of paper having figures of men, animals, &c., in varying positions. By turning the cylinder the images are seen through slots in its upper side, giving the effect of action to the figures. For instance, a clown jumping through a hoop is represented in perhaps a dozen different positions. The turning of the drum brings into view, in rapid succession, these varying positions until they blend into a perfect image full of motion, and operating to simulate natural action. A man sawing wood, an animal kicking, an acrobat playing with clubs, may be thus shown in apparent motion.

zō-har, s. [Heb. tschhar=whiteness, splendor.]

Hebrew Literature: A cabalistic commentary on the Old Testament.

zō-ī-lē'-an, a. [See def.] Pertaining or relating to Zoilus, a severe critic and grammarian of Amphipolis, who severely criticized Homer, Plato, and Socrates; hence, applied to bitter, severe, or malignant criticism or critics.

zō-īl-īsm, subst. [ZOILEAN.] Illiberal or carping criticism; unjust censure.

¶ Jennings (Curiosities of Criticism, 1881, p. 33) credits Tupper with having coined this word. It is, in reality, much older.

"Bring candid eyes unto the perusal of men's works, and let not zoilism or detraction blast well-intended labors."—Browne: Christian Morals, pt. ii., § 2.

zō-ī-ō-dīn, s. [Pref. zo-, and Gr. iōdēs=violet-like.] [IODINE.]

Chem.: Bonjean's name for the violet-colored substance deposited from the water which drips from glairine, taken out of sulphurous springs.

zōī'-site, s. [After Baron von Zois; suffix -ite (Min.).]

Mineralogy: An orthorhombic mineral formerly regarded as a variety of epidote, but now shown to be a distinct species. Hardness, 6-6½; specific gravity, 3.11-3.38; luster, pearly on cleavage faces, vitreous elsewhere; color, shades of gray, apple-green, peach-blossom to rose-red. Composition: Silica, 39.9; alumina, 22.8; lime, 37.3=100, whence the formula $2(\text{CaO} + \frac{1}{2}\text{Al}_2\text{O}_3)3\text{SiO}_2$. Dana divides as follows: A. Lime-zoisite, (1) ordinary, colors gray to white and brown, (2) rose-red or thulite; B. Lime-soda-zoisite, which includes Saussurite in part.

zō'-kor, s. [Native name.]

Zoölogy: Siphneus aspalax, a mole-rat from the Altai mountains. It lives in subterranean runlike those of the mole, but of much greater extent.

zō'-lā-īsm, subst. [From Emile Zola, a French novelist (born 1840), whose writings chiefly consist of intensely naturalistic descriptions of profligacy and low life.] Excessive naturalism; literature dealing exclusively, or almost exclusively, with the worst side of human nature.

"I have had in view a particular form of Zolaism much in vogue at this moment."—Athenæum, Dec. 30, 1882, p. 875.

zō-lā-īst'-ic, a. [ZOLAISM.] Excessively naturalistic; employing or delighting in excessive naturalism.

Zōll'-vēr-eīn (z as dz), s. [Ger. zoll=toll, duty, and verein=union or association.]

1. The German commercial or customs union, founded originally in 1827, but extended greatly after the war of 1866, when, owing to political considerations, Prussia obtained a preponderating influence in the union, which included the North German Bund, Bavaria, Württemberg, Baden, Hesse, and Luxemburg. This arrangement was brought prematurely to an end by the formation of the German Empire. By article 33 of the constitution of the Empire, the territory of the Zollverein coincides with the territories of the Empire, with the exceptions of the free ports of Hamburg, Altona, Bremen, Bremerhaven, Geestemünde, and Brahe, and some communes of the Grand-duchy of Baden, while Luxemburg and the Austrian canton of Junholz are included in it. Its object is the regulation of a uniform rate of customs duties throughout the various states comprised in the union. The free ports were included in the Zollverein in October, 1888.

2. Hence, any commercial or customs union.

"The Republics of Central and South America, Hayti, San Domingo, and the Brazilian Empire have decided to send delegates to Washington to promote an American Zollverein to the exclusion of the goods of other countries."—St. James's Gazette, May 10, 1888.

zōm'-bō-ruk, s. [ZUMBOORUK.]

zō-mī-dīn, s. [Gr. zōmos=broth; eidōs=resemblance, and Eng. suff. -in.]

Chem.: Berzelius' name for that portion of the extract of meat which is insoluble in alcohol.

zō-nā, s. [Lat., from Gr. zōnē=a girdle, from zōnnymi=to gird.]

1. Anat.: (See the compound.)

2. Pathol.: A name for Shingles (q. v.).

zona-pellucida, s. [VITELLINE-MEMBRANE.]

zōn'-al, a. [Eng. zon(e); -al.] Having the character of a zone, belt, or stripe.

zonal-pelargoniums, s. pl.

Bot.: Pelargoniums which have on their leaves zones of one or more colors differing from the ground colors.

zōn'-ar, zōn'-nar, s. [Gr. zōnarion, dimin. from zōnē=a zone (q. v.).] A belt or girdle which native Christians and Jews in the East were obliged to wear, to distinguish them from the Mohammedans.

zō-nār'-i-a, s. [Fem. sing. of Lat. zonarius=pertaining to a belt or girdle.]

Bot.: A genus of Fucaceæ, akin to Padina (q. v.), but not marked with concentric lines. The species occur chiefly in warm countries.

zō-nar'-yē, a. [Lat. zonarius=of or pertaining to a belt or girdle.]

Zoöl.: Of or pertaining to that form of deciduous placenta in which the villi are arranged in a belt. (Huxley.)

zō-nāte, a. [Eng. zon(e); -ate.]

Bot.: Marked with zones or concentric bands of color. Akin to ocellated, but with the concentric bands more numerous.

zōne, s. [Fr., from Lat. zona (q. v.).]

1. Ordinary Language:

*1. A girdle, a belt. (Milton: P. L., v. 280.)

2. Any well-marked band or stripe running round an object.

*3. Circuit, circumference. (Milton: P. L., v. 558.)

bōil, bōy; pōut, jōwl; cat, çell, chorus, çhin, bench; go, gem; thin, ðhis; sin, a; expect, Xenophon, exist. ph = f. -cian, -tian = shān. -tion, -sion = shūn; -ñion, -ñion = zhūn. -tious, -cious, -sious = shūs. -ble, -dle, &c. = bēl, dēl.

II. Technically:

1. Anat.: A region of the body formed by imaginary lines drawn around it transversely. Used spec. of the abdominal zones or regions.

2. Biology:

(1) A stripe or belt, as of color, on a plant, a shell, &c.

(2) A certain stratum of sea-water, the depth of the upper and under surfaces of which are generally measured or calculated in fathoms. There are five zones to mark the bathymetric distribution of marine animals. Some of them are named from the distribution of sea-plants, which also they mark:

The Littoral Zone, between tide marks.

The Laminarian Zone, from low water to fifteen fathoms.

The Coralline Zone, from fifteen to fifty fathoms.

The Deep-sea Coral Zone, fifty to a hundred fathoms.

The Abyssal Zone, beyond a hundred fathoms.

3. Geog.: One of five imaginary belts surrounding the earth. They are the North Frigid Zone, between the North Pole and the Arctic Circle; the North Temperate Zone, between the Arctic Circle and the Tropic of Cancer; the Torrid Zone, between the Tropic of Cancer and the Tropic of Capricorn; the South Temperate Zone, between the Tropic of Capricorn and the Antarctic Circle; and the South Frigid Zone, between the Antarctic Circle and the South Pole.

4. Geol. (pl.): Particular beds in the stages or divisions of certain geological formations. [AMMONITE, PRIMORDIAL-ZONE.]

5. Math.: The portion of the surface of a sphere included between two parallel planes.

(1) Annual zone: [ANNUAL, II. 3. (b).]

(2) Ciliary zone: [CILINARY ZONE.]

(3) Isothermal zone: [ISOTHERMAL.]

zōne*, v. t. [ZONE, s.] To encircle with or as with a zone (q. v.).

"His embrace

Had zoned her through the night."

Keats: Endymion, ii. 569.

zōned, a. [Eng. zon(e); -ed.]

*1. Having a girdle or belt; wearing a girdle or belt.

2. Having zones or bands resembling zones, striped; in botany the same as ZONATE (q. v.).

"She brought us Academic silks, in hue
The lilac, with a silken hood to each
And zoned with gold."

Tennyson: Princess, ii. 4.

zōne-lēss, a. [Eng. zone; -less.] Destitute of a zone or girdle; ungirded.

"In careless folds loose fell her zoneless vest."

Mason: Isis.

zōn*-īc, s. [Eng. zone; -ic.] A zone, a girdle, a belt.

"The place where I was bred stands upon a zonic of coal."—Smollett: Travels, let. iv.

zōn-nār, s. [ZONAR.]

zō-nō-chlōr-īte, s. [English zon(e); o connect., and chlorite.]

Min.: The same as CHLORASTROLITE (q. v.).

zō-nō-trīch-ī-ā, subst. [Gr. zōnē=a girdle, and trichias=one that is hairy.]

Ornith.: A genus of Fringillidae, with nine species, ranging over the whole Nearctic and Neotropical regions. Beak slightly conical, upper mandible straight and somewhat pointed; wings moderate, reaching as far as upper tail-coverts; tarsus high, toes long.

zō-nū-lā, s. [Lat.=a little girdle; dimin. from zona (q. v.).]

Anat.: A small zone; as, the Zonula of Zinn, the anterior portion of the hyaloid membrane which is firmer and more fibrous than the rest. Called also the Suspensory Ligament of the Lens. (Quain.)

zō-nū-lar, a. [Eng. zonul(e); -ar.]

1. Ordinary Lang.: Of or relating to zone; zone-shaped.

2. Zoöl.: Of or pertaining to that form of non-deciduous placenta in which the foetal villi are arranged in a comparatively broad band. (Glossary to Huxley's Class. of Animals.)

zō-nūle, s. [A dimin. from zone (q. v.).] A little zone, band, or belt.

zō-nū-lēt, subst. [A double dimin. from zone=zone-ule-let.] A little zone or belt; a zonule.

"So smiles that riband 'bout my Julia's waist;

Or like—nay, 'tis that zonulet of love."

Herrick: Upon Julia's Ribbon.

zō-nūr-ī-dæ, s. pl. [Mod. Lat. zonur(us); Lat. fem. pl. adj. suff. -īdæ.]

Zoöl.: A family of Brevilinguia (q. v.) with fifteen genera containing fifty-two species. Their distribution is remarkable; more than half the family come from South Africa, others are from Madagascar, America (from Mexico to British Columbia), and three of the genera form a distinct sub-group—the Glass Snakes—from North Africa, North America, the southeast of Europe, and the Khasya Hills. The family contains forms which have the shape of lizards, and others which are serpentine. Head pyramidal or depressed; body covered with scales in cross bands; sides with distinct longitudinal fold; limbs four, strong, entirely wanting, or concealed beneath the skin; ears distinct, eyelids present.

zō-nūr-ūs, s. [Gr. zōnē=a belt, and oura=the tail.]

Zoöl.: The type-genus of Zonuridae (q. v.), with several species, from the south and east of Africa and Madagascar.

zō-ō, zō-, pref. [Gr. zōon=a living creature, an animal.] A common prefix in compounds of Greek origin, signifying animal, as zoölogy zoöphyte, zoöspore, &c.

zō-ō-cāp'-sa, s. [Pref. zoo-, and Lat. capsa=a repository, chest, or box.]

Palæont.: The oldest known genus of Balanidae. It is from the Lias.

zō-ō-carp, s. [Pref. zoo-, and Gr. karpos=fruit.]

Bot.: A zoöspore (q. v.).

zō-ō-cāu'-lōn, s. [Pref. zoo-, and Gr. kaulos=a stalk, a stem.]

Biol.: An erect, branching, tentaculiferous colony-stock, as in the genus Dendrosoma (q. v.).

zō-ō-chēm'-īc-āl, a. [Pref. zoo-, and Eng. chemical.] Of or pertaining to zoöchemistry (q. v.).

"The application of zoöchemical facts to the elucidation of processes taking place in the system."—Frey: Histology of Man (tr. Barker), p. 6.

zō-ō-chēm'-īs-trī, zō*-ōch'-ē-mý, subst. [Eng. zoo-, and Eng. chemistry.]

Nat. Science: (See extract.)

"Study of the nature of the substances occurring in the animal economy—their properties, constitution, transformation, &c., constitutes what is termed zoöchemistry."—Frey: Histology of Man (tr. Barker), p. 6.

zō-ōch'-ē-mý, s. [ZOOCHEMISTRY.]

zō-ō-çyt'-ī-ūm (pl. zō-ō-çyt'-ī-ā), s. [Pref. zoo-, and Gr. kytos=a cell.]

Biol.: The gelatinous matrix excreted and inhabited by various colonial Infusoria—e. g., Ophrydium, Phalansterium, &c.

zō-ō-dēn'-drī-ūm (pl. zō-ō-dēn'-drī-ā), subst. [Pref. zoo-, and Gr. dendron=a tree.]

Biol.: The tree-like colony-stock of such Infusoria as Dendromonas and Epistylis.

zō-ō-çī-ūm (pl. zō-ō-çī-ā), s. [Pref. zoo-, and Gr. oikos=a dwelling.]

Biol.: One of the cells or chambers inhabited by the polypide of a Polyzoon. In the Common Sea-mat (Flustra foliacea) the zoöcia may be made out with the naked eye, and are very clearly seen with a lens of moderate power.

zō-ō-gēn, zō-ō-gēne, s. [Gr. zōogenēs=born of an animal; pref. zoo-, and Gr. gennao=to produce.]

Chem.: The same as ZOIODIN (q. v.).

zō-ō-gēn'-īc, a. [Eng. zoögen(y); -ic.] Of or pertaining to animal production.

zō-ōg'-ēn-ý, zō-ōg'-ōn-ý, s. [Pref. zoo-, and Gr. genesis, gonē=generation.]

Nat. Science: The doctrine of the formation of the organs of living beings.

zō-ō-gē-ō-grāph'-īc-āl, a. [Pref. zoo-, and Eng. geographical.] Of or pertaining to zoögeography (q. v.).

"None of the great zoögeographical provinces are sharply defined from one another."—Proc. Zoöl. Soc., 1868, p. 317.

zō-ō-gē-ōg'-rā-phý, s. [Pref. zoo-, and English geography.]

Nat. Science: The study of the distribution of animals over the surface of the earth, their migrations, &c.

"The relations of these subdivisions to zoögeography."—Proc. Zoöl. Soc., 1868, p. 295.

zō*-ō-glōe'-ā, s. [Pref. zoo-, and Gr. glōia=glue.]

Bot.: A pseudo-genus of Schizomycetes, consisting of Bacteria when they have reached the stage of development at which they form gelatinous colonies. They still continue to grow and divide, and may again become active.

zō-ōg'-rā-phēr, subst. [Eng. zoögraph(y); -er.] One who studies or practices zoögraphy; one who describes animals, their forms and habits.

"Upon inquiry we find no mention hereof in ancient zoögraphers."—Browne: Vulgar Errors, bk. v., ch. i.

zō-ō-grāph'-īc, zō-ō-grāph'-īc-āl, adj. [Eng. zoögraph(y); -ic, -ical.] Of or pertaining to zoögraphy, or the description of animals, their forms and habits.

zō-ōg'-rā-phist, s. [Eng. zoögraph(y); -ist.] One who describes or depicts animals; a zoögrapher; a zoölogist.

zō-ōg'-rāph-ý, s. [Gr. zōon=an animal, and graphō=to describe, to write.] A description of animals, their forms and habits.

"We are conducted to zoögraphy, and the whole body of physick."—Glanvill: Vanity of Dogmatizing, ch. xxii.

zō-ō-gýr'-ō-scōpe, subst. [Pref. zoo-, and Eng. gyroscope.] An amplification of the zoötrope (q. v.) in which a series of successive instantaneous photographs of an animal in motion are placed on a circular rotating glass, the photographs being alternately illuminated by an oxyhydrogen lantern, as the glass turns, throwing a single, continuous, everchanging picture on a screen. Although the separate photographs show the successive positions of an animal in motion—for instance, a horse, in making a single stride—the zoögyroscope throws on the screen a vivid presentment of a moving animal.

zō-ō-īd, zō-ōīd, s. & a. [Gr. zōon=an animal, and eidos=resemblance.]

A. As substantive:

Biol.: An animal organism not independently developed from a fertilized ovum, but derived from a preceding individual by the process of fission or gemmation. Specially applicable to the Infusoria and other Protozoa, and to the component members of all stock-building communities, such as Polypes, Corals, and Polyzoa.

B. As adj.: Pertaining to or resembling an animal.

zō-ōl'-ā-trý, s. [Pref. zoo-, and Greek latreia=worship.]

Compar. Relig.: Animal worship; adoration paid by man to any of the lower animals. This cultus seems to have passed through three stages: (1) The animal was revered and propitiated as possessing a power greater than that of man; (2) the animal was regarded as an incarnation of some deity or spirit; (3) it was raised to the position of a tribal ancestor. [TOTEM.] In the early history of the human race zoölatry of some kind was very prevalent. Traces of it appear in the Bible, as in the story of the Golden Calf made by the Israelites (Exod. xxxii). Zoölatry took deep root in the religious life of the ancient Egyptians, and all three forms flourished among that people. Juvenal opens his fifteenth satire with a scathing invective of Egyptian zoölatry, and detailed accounts of it occur in Herodotus (ii). Plutarch (de Iside et Osiride), Strabo (lib. xvii.), and Cicero (de Nat. Deor., iii. 15). In classic times the chief form of zoölatry was serpent-worship (q. v.), though traces of other forms occur in the transformation myths of the poets. In the present day zoölatry survives chiefly in India [VISHNU, HUNOON, ZEBU], among the snake-worshippers of the west coast of Africa, and the Red Indians of North America.

"The three motives of animal-worship . . . viz., direct worship of the animal for itself, indirect worship of it as a fetish acted through by a deity, and veneration of it as a totem or representative of a tribe-ancestor, no doubt account in no small measure for the phenomena of zoölatry among the lower races, due allowance being also made for the effects of myths and symbolisms, of which we may gain frequent glimpses."—Tylor: Prim. Cult. (ed. 1873), ii. 237.

zō-ō-līte, s. [Pref. zoo-, and Gr. lithos=a stone.] A fossil animal substance.

zō-ōl'-ō-gēr, s. [Eng. zoölog(y); -er.] The same as ZOÖLOGIST (q. v.).

"As the naturalists may thus illustrate pathology as a chemist, so may he do the like as a zoöloger."—Boyle: Works, ii. 84.

zō-ō-lōg'-īc-āl, a. [Eng. zoölog(y); -ical.] Of or pertaining to zoölogy or the science of animals.

lāte, fāt, fāre, amidst, whāt, fāl, father; wē, wēt, hēre, camel, hēr, thēre; pīne, pīt, sīre, sīr, marīne; gō, pōt or, wōre, wōlf, wōrk, whō, sōn; mūte, cūb, cūre, unite, cūr, rāle, fūll; trý, Sýrian. æ, œ = ē; ey = ā. qu = kw.

zoölogical-garden, s. A public garden in which a collection of animals is kept. The gardens of the Zoological Society, Regent's Park, London, are among the finest in the world. The chief zoölogical gardens are: Lincoln Park, Chicago; Central Park, New York; Paris (Jardin des Plantes), London; Dublin, Antwerp, Berlin, Brussels, Rotterdam, Melbourne, Frankfurt, Cologne, Paris (Jardin d'Acclimatation), Hamburg, Moscow, Philadelphia, Cincinnati, Calcutta.

Zoöl.: A zoölogical-region

zoölogical-region, s.

Biol.: [REGION, s., II. 2.]

Zoölogical Society, s.

Societies: A society for the prosecution of zoölogical research; specif. the Zoölogical Society of London, founded in 1826 by a body of scientists, among whom Sir Stamford Raffles and Sir Humphrey Davy, Bart., were especially prominent, "for the advancement of Zoölogy and Animal Physiology, and for the introduction of new and curious subjects of the Animal Kingdom."

zō-ō-lōg'-īc-āl-lŷ, adv. [Eng. zoölogical; -ly.] In a zoölogical manner; according to the teachings or principles of zoölogy.

zō-ōl'-ō-gīst, s. [Eng. zoölog(y); -ist.]

Physical Science: A person skilled in or devoted to zoölogy (q. v.). In modern usage the term is being replaced by biologist.

zō-ōl'-ō-gŷ, s. [Pref. zoo-, and Gr. logos=a discourse.]

Natural Science: The study of living animals, a branch of Biology, which also includes Botany, though it is impossible accurately to define the limits of these two branches, some organisms, low in the scale of life, being sometimes claimed as animals and sometimes as plants. Zoölogy covers a large ground, which becomes larger with the growth of the science. The chief branches of Zoölogy are: (1) Morphology, dealing with form and structure; (2) Comparative Anatomy, which investigates the position and relation of organs and parts (and, as this must be the foundation of scientific classification, the term Comparative Anatomy is often used as synonymous with the older term Zoölogy); (3) Embryology, dealing with development from the ovum to maturity; (4) Physiology (q. v.), which treats of the organs of nutrition, reproduction, and the nervous system; (5) Classification or Taxonomy, which classifies animals into natural groups; (6) Zoögeography (q. v.); and (7) Descent of the individual (Ontogenesis) and of the phylum (Phylogenesis). From the earliest times man was accustomed to study and observe the lower animals. Solomon's description of the ant (Prov. vi. 6-8) is justified by the scientific observation of the nineteenth century; Job (xxxix. 14) knew the peculiar method of incubation adopted by the ostrich; and Jeremiah (Lam. iv. 3.) speaks in unmistakable terms of marine mammals. Aristotle and Pliny have recorded many zoölogical facts, and nearly as many legends; but from that time down to the days of Ray and Willughby there was scarcely any attempt at scientific classification, nor was it till the eighteenth century that anything like a comprehensive scheme was put forth in the Systema Naturæ of Linnæus, who divided the Animal Kingdom into six classes: Mammalia, Aves, Pisces, Amphibia, Insecta, and Vermes, these classes being divided into orders, and these again into genera, without any intermediate division. In the light of the present day this scheme is seen to be erroneous, but it formed a rough outline, which served as a guide to future inquirers. Cuvier's classification came next, with four sub-kingdoms: Vertebrata, Mollusca, Articulata, and Radiata. Agassiz adopted these main divisions, but arranged his classes somewhat differently. The classification of Owen in his Comparative Anatomy of Vertebrates (ed. 2d, p. 16) was:

SUB-KINGDOM.		DIVISIONS.
VERTEBRATA.	MOLLUSCA.	Pisces, Aves, Reptilia, Mammalia.
		Tunicata, Branchiopoda, Lamelli- branchiata, Pteropoda, Gastero- poda, Cephalopoda.
ARTICULATA.		Cirripedia, Annelata, Epizoa, Crus- tacea, Insecta, Arachnida.

SUB-KINGDOM.		DIVISIONS.
PROTOZOA.	INFUSORIA.	Rotifera, Rhizopoda, Polygastrica.
		Cœlamintha, Turbellaria, Sterelmintha.
RADIARIA.	ECHINODERMATA.	Bryozoa, Anthozoa, Aculephæ, Hydrozoa.

Huxley (Introd. to Class. of Animals, 1869) adopted the following:

SUB-KINGDOM.		DIVISIONS.
PROTOZOA.	INFUSORIA.	Rhizopoda, Gregarina, Radiolaria, Spongida.
OCELETERATA.	ANNULOIDA.	Hydrozoa, Actinozoa.
		Scolecida, Echinoderma.

ANNULOSA.

MOLLUSCOIDA.

MOLLUSCA.

VERTEBRATA.

Crustacea, Arachnida, Myriapoda, Insecta, Chætogatha, Annelida. Polyzoa, Branchiopoda, Tunicata. Lamellibranchiata, Branchiogastropoda, Pulmogastropoda, Pteropoda, Cephalopoda. Pisces, Amphibia, Reptilia, Aves, Mammalia.

Last and chief in importance is the classification of Gegenbaur, of which Ray Lankester says (in his preface to Gegenbaur's Elements of Comp. Anat., ed. Bell), that "at the present day, naturalists have learnt to recognize in their efforts after what was vaguely called the 'natural' system of classification, an unconscious attempt to construct the pedigree of the animal world. The attempt has now become a conscious one. Necessarily classifications which aim at exhibiting the pedigree vary from year to year with the increase in our knowledge. They also vary according to the importance attached by their authors to one or another class of facts as demonstrating blood-relationship."

PHYLUM.	DIVISIONS.
1. PROTOZOA.	Rhizopoda, Gregarina, Infusoria.
2. CELEENTERATA.
(1) Spongiæ.
(2) Acalephæ.	Hydromedusæ, Calyconoa, Theco- medusæ, Medusæ, Anthozoa, Cte- nophora.
3. VERMES.	Platyhelminthes, Nemathelminthes, Chaetognathi, Acanthocephali, Bry- ozoa, Rotatoria, Enteropneusti, Gephyrea, Annelata.
4. ECHINODERMA.	Asteroida, Crinoida, Echinoida, Ho- lothuroidea.
5. ARTHROPODA.	Crustacea, Pœcilopoda, Arachnida, Myriapoda, Insecta.
6. BRACHIOPODA.
7. MOLLUSCA.	Lamellibranchiata, Scaphopoda, Gastropoda, Pteropoda, Cephalo- poda.
8. TUNICATA.
9. VERTEBRATA.	Leptocardii.
(1) Acrania.	(a) Cyclostomata (Myxinoidea, Pe- tromyzontes).
(2) Craniota.	(b) Gnathostomata. (i.) Anamnia (Pisces, Amphibia). (ii.) Amniota (Sauropsida, Mam- malia).

zō-ō-mēl'-ān-īn, s. [Prefix zoo-, and English melanin.]

Chem.: Bogdanow's name for the black pigment of birds' feathers. It is slightly soluble in water, but dissolves readily in potash and ammonia.

zō-ō-mor'-phic, a. [Pref. zoo-, and Gr. morphē=shape, form.]

1. Ord. Lang.: Pertaining to or exhibiting animal forms.

"That peculiarly Celtic form of interlacing zoömorphie decoration, united with colored designs of diverging spirals and trumpet scrolls."—Jos. Anderson. (Annandale.)

2. Anthrop.: Representing a god or other supernatural being under the form of one of the lower animals. The zoömorphie element in Classic mythology appears in such cases as that of the Sminthean Apollo, and the metamorphoses of Jupiter; it is very strongly marked in the religion of ancient Egypt [ZOÖLATRY], and traces of it may be found among the Jews and in the poetic imagery of the Apocalypse. (Gen. iii. 24; Exod. xxv. 18; Ezek. x. 14, xi. 18; Exod. xxxiii.; Rev. iv. 6, 8, 9; v. 6, 14; i. 6; vii. 11; xiv. 3; xv. 7; xix. 4.)

"The facts of savage animal-worship, and their relations to totemism, seem still unknown to or unappreciated by scholars, with the exception of Mr. Sayce, who recognises totemism as the origin of the zoömorphie element in Egyptian religion."—A. Lang: Custom & Myth, p. 118.

zō-ō-morph'-ism, s. [ZOÖMORPHIC.]

1. The state or condition of being zoömorphie; characteristic exhibition of the forms of the lower animals, as distinct from man.

"That zoömorphie of ornamentation which in this case is only partially present."—Jos. Anderson. (Annandale.)

2. The transformation of men into beasts. (Smart.) zō-ōn, s. [Gr. zōon=an animal.]

Biol.: The product of a fertilized ovum.

"It is urged that whether the development of the fertilized germ be continuous or discontinuous is a matter of secondary importance; that the totality of living tissue to which the fertilized germ gives rise in any one case is the equivalent of the totality to which it gives rise in any other case; and that we must recognize this equivalence, whether such totality of living tissue takes a concrete or a discrete arrangement. In pursuance of this view a zoölogical individual is constituted either by any such single animal as a mammal or bird, which may properly claim the title of a zōon, or by any such group of animals as the numerous Medusæ that have been developed from the same egg, which are to be severally distinguished as zooids."—Herbert Spencer: Prin. Biol., §73.

zō-ōn'-īc, a. [Eng. zōon; -ic.] Derived from or contained in animal substances.

zoönic-acid, s.

Chem.: Berthollet's name for the impure acetic acid, obtained by the dry distillation of animal substances.

zō-ōn'-ite, s. [ZOOTITES.]

Zoölogy:

1. Gen.: One of the theoretic transverse divisions of any segmented animal.

2. Spec.: One of the segments of an articulated animal.

zō-ō-nī-tēs, s. [ZOOT.]

Biol.: A term proposed as an equivalent of zooid (q. v.).

"In order to confine the term individual to such cases [the direct product of the germ-cell and sperm-cell] it has been proposed among animals to give the term zooid or zoönites to the independent structures which result from sprouting, gemmation, or fission."—Eng. Cyclop. (Zööl.), iv. 561. (Note.)

zō-ōn'-ō-mŷ, zō-ō-nō'-mī-a, s. [Pref. zō-, and Gr. nomos=a law.] The laws of animal life, or the science which treats of the phenomena of animal life, their causes and relations.

zō-ōph'-a-gā, s. pl. [Gr. zoöphagos=living on animal food; carnivorous.]

*1. Ord. Lang.: An old popular name for the larger and fiercer carnivora. It has no scientific value.

2. Zoöl.: Gegenbaur's name for a group of Marsupials equivalent to Owen's Sarcophaga (q. v.).

†zō-ōph'-a-gān, subst. [ZOÖPHAGA.] One of the zoöphaga; a sarcophagan.

†zō-ōph'-a-goūs, adj. [Mod. Lat. zoöphag(a); Eng. adj. suff. -ous.] Devouring or feeding on animals; sarcophagous.

"The zoöphagous marsupials already cited."—Owen: Brit. Fossil Mammals, p. 65.

zō-ōph'-ī-līst, s. [Pref. zoo-, Gr. phileō=to love, and Eng. suff. -ist.] A lover of animals, or of anything living; one whose sympathy embraces all living creation.

"Our philosopher and zoöphilist."—Southey: Doctor, ch. cxxviii.

†zō-ōph'-ī-lōus, a. [Pref. zoo-, and Gr. phileō=to love.]

Nat. Science: (See extract.)

"The most interesting article in the number [Nuovo a Giornale Botanico Italiano] for July is by Sig. A. Piccone, on the plants growing wild in Liguria which he terms 'zoöphilous' or 'ornithophilous,' i. e., those which are absolutely dependent for the germination of their seeds on the fruit being swallowed by birds."—Nature, Aug. 26, 1886, p. 403.

zō-ōph'-ī-lŷ, subst. [ZOÖPHILIST.] A love of animals; a sympathy or tender care for living creatures, which prevents all unnecessary acts of cruelty or destruction.

zō-ō-phōr'-īc, a. [Eng. zoöphor(us); -ic.] Bearing or supporting an animal; as, a zoöphoric column, that is, one supporting the figure of an animal.

zō-ōph'-ōr-ūs, s. [Gr. zoöphoros.]

Anc. Arch.: A part between the architrave and cornice; the same as the frieze in modern architecture; so called from the figures of animals carved on it. [ZOÖPHORIC.]

†zō-ō-phŷ'-tā, s. pl. [Mod. Lat., from Gr. zoöphyton=an animal-plant. (Arist.: Hist. Anim., xviii. 1-6.)]

Zoöl.: A term borrowed from Aristotle by Cuvier, and used by him as a synonym of Radiata (q. v.). The term has no longer any scientific value, but is often loosely applied as a designation for many plant-like animals, as sponges, corals, &c., more or less resembling plants in appearance. "When the term began to be used by naturalists, it designated a miscellaneous class of beings, which were believed to occupy the space between the animal and vegetable kingdoms, and in which the characteristics of the subjects of each met and were intermingled." (Ency. Brit., ed. 8th.)

zō-ō-phŷte, s. [ZOÖPHYTA.] Any individual of Cuvier's Radiata (q. v.); an animal of extremely low organization, presenting many external resemblances to a plant.

"The second step Nature takes is from plants to Plant-animals, zoöphytes. 'There are many marine creatures,' he [Aristotle] says, 'which leave the observer in doubt as to whether they are plants or animals, for they grow on the rocks, and many die if detached.'"—G. H. Lewes: Aristotle, p. 192.

zoöphyte-trough, s. A live-box (q. v.)

zō-ō-phŷt'-īc, zō-ō-phŷt'-īc-āl, adj. [English zoöphyt(e); -ic, -ical.] Pertaining or relating to zoöphytes.

zō-ōph'-ŷ-tōld, a. [Eng. zoöphyt(e); suff. -oid.] Like or resembling a zoöphyte.

bōil, bōy; pōut, jōw1; cat, çell, chorus, çhin, bench; go, gem; thin, ðhis; sin, aş; expect, Xenophon, exist. ph = f. -cian, -tian = şan. -tion. -sion = şhñ: -ñion. -şion = zhñ. -tious. -cious. -sious = şhş. -ble, -dle, &c. = be1, de1.

zō-ō-phy-tō-lōg'-īc-āl, a. [English zoöphyto-logy(y); -ical.] Pertaining or relating to zoöphytology.

zō-ō-phy-tōl'-ō-gy', s. [Eng. zoöphyt(e); -ology.] The natural history of zoöphytes.

zō-ō-phy-tōn, s. [Gr.] A zoöphyte (q. v.).

"A zoöphyton may be rightly said to have a middle excellency between an animal and a plant."—Henry More: Mystery of Iniquity, p. 27.

†zō-ō-spērm, s. [Pref. zoo-, and Eng. sperm.]

Zoöl.: A Spermatozoön (q. v.).

zō-ō-spō-rān'-gī-ūm (pl. zō-ō-spō-rān'-gī-ā), s. [Pref. zoo-, and Mod. Lat. sporangium (q. v.).]

Zoöl.: The cell in which a zoöspore is formed or becomes encysted.

zō-ō-spōre, s. [ZOÖSPOREÆ.]

Bot. (pl.): Reproductive bodies of certain Algae of low organization [PROTOPHYTA], as many Confervæ (q. v.). They have ciliated processes, which enable them to swim about, and from this animal-like locomotion are with difficulty separated from the infusorial animalcules. Each zoöspore when set free from the tough coat in which it is for a time encysted is capable of living independently.

zō-ō-spōr'-ē-æ, s. pl. [Pref. zoo-; Gr. spora, sporos = . . . a seed, and Latin fem. pl. adj. suff. -æ.]

Bot.: A primary group of Algae, proposed by Thuret to contain those species which are propagated by zoöspores. He divides it into: (1) Chlorosporeæ, color usually green; (2) Pheosporeæ, color brown or olive.

zō-ō-spōr'-īc, adj. [Eng. zoöspor(e); -ic.] Pertaining to or having the character of zoöspores.

zō-ō-stē-ār'-īc, a. [Pref. zoo-, and Eng. stearic.] Containing fat and derived from animal substances.

zoöstearic-acid, s.

Chem.: Landerer's name for a fatty acid, obtained from the bones of fossil mammalia, and crystallizing from alcohol in laminæ. (Watts.)

zō-ō-teir'-ā, s. [Pref. zoo-, and Greek teiros = a constellation.]

Zoöl.: A genus of Radiolaria. No siliceous skeleton, but contracted pointed filaments elevated on a pedicle and not contractile.

zō-ō-thām'-nī-ūm, s. [Pref. zoo-, and Gr. thamos = a copse, a thicket.]

Zoöl.: A genus of Peritrichous Infusoria, from salt and fresh water. Animalcules structurally identical with those of Vorticella (q. v.), ovate, pyriform, or globular, often dissimilar in shape, and of two sizes, stationed at the extremities of a branching, highly contractile pedicle, the internal muscle of which is continuous throughout. There are several species, divided into two groups according as the zoöids of the same colony resemble or differ from each other.

zō-ō-thē'-ca, subst. [Pref. zoo-, and Gr. thēkē = a case.]

Anat. & Physiol.: A cell containing a spermatozoöid.

zō-ō-thē'-cī-ūm (pl. zō-ō-thē'-cī-ā), s. [ZOO-THÉCA.]

Biol.: Any compound tubular structure excreted and inhabited by Infusoria like Rhipidodendron.

zō-ō-thō'-mē, s. [Pref. zoo-, and Gr. thōmos = a heap.]

Zoöl.: A Zoöthecium (q. v.).

zō-ōt'-īc, a. [Gr. zōon = an animal.] Containing the remains of organic life. (Said of rocks, coal, caves, &c.)

zoötic-acid, s. [HYDROCYANIC-ACID.]

zō-ōt'-ō-ca, s. [Mod. Lat., from Gr. zōotokos = producing its young alive. (Arist. H. A., i. 25.)]

Zoöl.: A genus of Lacertidæ, with eight species, from Central and Southern Europe, Madeira, South Africa, and Australia. One, Zoötoca vivipara, the Viviparous Lizard (q. v.), is British. Sometimes made a sub-genus of Lacerta, from which it is distinguished by having the posterior nasal shield single.

zō-ō-tōm'-īc-āl, a. [Eng. zoötom(y); -ical.] Of or pertaining to zoöotomy.

zō-ōt'-ō-mīst, s. [ZOÖTOMY.] One who dissects the bodies of the lower animals; a comparative anatomist.

zō-ōt'-ō-mý, s. [Pref. zoo-, and Gr. tomē = a cutting.]

Nat. Science: The dissection of the lower animals.

zō-ōx-ān'-thīn, subst. [Pref. zoo-, and Eng. xanthīn.]

Chem.: A dark-red powder, extracted from the feathers of Calurus auriceps, by repeated treatment with hot alcohol.

zoō'-zoō, s. [Onomatopoeic.] A wood-pigeon. (Prov.) zōph'-ōr-ūs, s. [ZOOPHORUS.]

zō-pī-lō'-tē, s. [Sp.] [URUBU.]

zō-pīs'-sā, s. [Lat., from Gr. zōpissa. (See def.)]

Pathol.: A mixture of pitch and tar impregnated with salt-water, scraped from the hulls of ships. It was formerly used as an external application, being believed to be resolute and desiccative. (Simmonds.)

zorg'-īte, s. [After Zorge, Hartz, where first found; suff. -ite (Min.).]

Min.: A massive granular mineral, occurring with many other species in the metalliferous lodes of the Hartz. Hardness, 2½; specific gravity, 7 to 7½; luster, metallic; color, lead-gray, sometimes with a yellowish tarnish. Composition: A selenide of lead and copper.

zō-rīl'-lā, †zōr'-ille, s. [Sp. zorilla = the whelp of a fox, from zorro = a fox.]

Zoöl.: Ictonyx zorilla, a Viverrine Mammal, possessing fetid scent glands, allied to the Skunks and Badgers, extending over Africa and into Asia Minor. Snout elongated, body stout, tail bushy; total length about twenty inches; color, shining black, marked with white spots and bands. It is often tamed, and trained to catch rats and mice.

Zorilla.

[Named after John Zorn, a Bavarian botanical author (1739-99).]

Bot.: A genus of Hedysaræ. Herbaceous plants with pinnate leaves, having two or four leaflets and papilionaceous flowers, in spikes or solitary. Known species about ten, mostly from America. Zornia diphylla is used as horse provender by the Foulahs.

Zōr-ō-as'-trī-ān, a. & s. [See def.]

A. As adj.: Of or pertaining to Zoroaster or Zoroastres, the classical name of an illustrious personage called in Persian Zartusht, Zaratusht, or Zardusht, and in Zend Zarathustra, founder or reformer of the Parsee religion. He is generally said to have been born in 589, at Urmia, a town of Azerbaijan, and died B. C. 539. But other dates have been assigned, and there may have been more than one Zoroaster. [ZOROASTRIANISM.]

B. As subst.: A follower of Zoroaster, a professor of Zoroastrianism (q. v.).

zōr-ō-ās'-trī-ān-īsm, s. [English zoroastrian; -ism.]

Compar. Relig.: The religious system said to have been taught by Zoroaster, by which term Dr. Haug understands a series of religious teachers rather than a single person bearing the name. The old Persians and the Brahmins continued one people after they had separated from the primitive Aryan stock, their faith being Nature-worship. For the subsequent religious schisms between them see BRAHMANISM. The first Zoroaster, if there was more than one, is believed by Dr. Haug to have lived as early as Moses, or, at least, not later than Solomon. He was the reformer rather than the originator of the faith called after his name. The Zoroastrian sacred book is the Zend Avesta (q. v.). The creed founded on it was professed by the old Persians, as it is by their successors the modern Parsees, sometimes called Fire-worshippers. It teaches that there always has existed a certain entity, whose name, Zarúána Akarana, has been translated "Time without bounds." This entity is represented as having simultaneously brought into existence two exceedingly powerful beings: One, Hormuzd, the creator and patron of all good; the other, Ahriman, the author and supporter of all evil. Hormuzd created light, and Ahriman darkness. The two beings are in perpetual conflict; and each has under him a hierarchy of angels. This system is denounced in Isaiah xlv. 5-7. With it another creed—that of fire-worship—possibly derived through the Magi from the Turanians, became commingled; there is allusion to it in Ezekiel viii. 16-18. Both beliefs go to constitute the modern Parsee faith. Professor Haug believes that the teaching of the primitive Zoroaster was misunderstood, and that it was much purer than the system of doctrine which has long passed current in his name. [FIRE-WORSHIP, GUEBRE, PARSEE.]

zōs'-mā, s. [Corrupt. Arabic.]

Astron.: A fixed star of magnitude 2½. Called also Delta Leonis.

zōs'-tēr, s. [Lat. = shingles, from Gr. zōstēr = a girdle.]

Pathol.: [SHINGLES.]

zōs'-tēr-ā, s. [Gr. zōstēr = a girdle.]

1. Bot.: Grass-wrack; the typical genus of Zosteraceæ (q. v.), which is sometimes reduced to a tribe of Naiadaceæ. The species are grass-like sea plants, Zostera Marina.

1. Spadix. 2. Pistil. 3. Antheæ. The former has leaves one to three feet long and a many-flowered spadix, the latter has the leaves six inches long and a few-flowered spadix. They occur in muddy and sandy estuaries near low-water mark, the second being the rarer species. Z. marina is used largely in continental Europe for packing small fancy articles for exportation, and for stuffing cushions.

2. Palæobot.: One species is found in the British Pleistocene.

zōs-tēr-ā'-çē-æ, s. pl. [Latin zoster(a); Latin fem. pl. adj. suff. -acæ.]

Bot.: Sea-wracks, an order of Endogens, alliance Hydralæ. Marine plants living among seaweeds, and resembling them in appearance. Leaves thin, grassy, sheathing at the base; flowers very minute, naked, or surrounded by three scales situated within herbaceous spathes. Anthers definite in number, sessile, one or two celled; stigmas one or two, capillary; ovary free, one-celled; ovule one; fruit drupaceous, one-celled, with a single pendulous seed. Found chiefly at the bottom of the ocean, though occasionally on the shore, especially in the Eastern hemisphere. Known genera five, species twelve. (Kunth & Lindley.)

zōs-tēr-īte, s. [Mod. Latin zostera; suff. -ite.] A fossil zostera, or some allied species of plant.

zōs-tēr-ōps, s. [Gr. zōstēr = a girdle, and ops = the eye. Named from a well-defined circlet of light-colored feathers round the eye.] [WHITE-EYE.]

Ornith.: A genus of Dicæidæ, with sixty-eight species, ranging over the Ethiopian, Oriental, and Australian regions, as far east as the Fiji Islands, and north to Pekin and Japan. Bill shorter than head, acuminate, finely emarginate at tip; nostrils lateral, linear, covered by a membrane; wings with ten primaries; tarsi long; tail moderate, even.

zō-thē'-cā, s. [Gr. zōthēkē.]

Ancient Arch.: A small compartment or alcove which might be separated from an adjoining compartment by a curtain.

Zouave (ou as w), Zōu'-ave, subst. [Fr., from zwawa, the name of a Kabyle or Berber tribe in Algeria.] A soldier belonging to the light infantry corps of the French army, which were organized in Algeria, soon after the conquest of that country in 1830, and were originally intended to be composed exclusively of the Kabyle tribe. This idea, however, was soon abandoned, and since 1840 the corps has been composed almost entirely of French soldiers, recruited from the veterans of ordinary line regiments, who are distinguished for their fine physique and tried courage. They still, however, retain the picturesque dress originally adopted, consisting of a loose dark-blue jacket and waistcoat, baggy Turkish trousers, yellow leather leggings, white gaiters, a sky-blue sash, and a red fez with yellow tassel. The few corps composed of Algerines still connected with the French army are now known as Turcos. The name was also given to several regiments which served on the side of the North in the American Civil War, but these were only distinguished from the other volunteer regiments by their picturesque uniform.

zōunds, exclam. [See def.] An exclamation contracted from "God's wounds," and much used formerly as an oath, or as an expression of anger or wonder.

zōutch, v. t. [Etym. doubtful.] To stew, as flounders, whittings, gudgeons, eels, &c., with just enough liquid to cover them. (Prov.)

Zuben el Genubi, subst. [Corrupted Arabic.] [ZUBENESCH.]

Astron.: A fixed star of the third magnitude, called also Alpha Libræ. It is of a pale-yellow color.

fate, fāt, fāre, amidst, whāt, fāll, father; wē, wēt, hēre, camel, hēr, thēre; pine, pīt, sīre, sīr, marine; gō, pōt, or, wōre, wōlf, wōrk, whō, sōn; mūte, cūb, cūre, unite, cūr, rāle, fūll; trȳ, Sȳrian. æ, œ = ē; ey = ā. qu = kw.

*zubenely, s. [Corrupted Arabic.]

Astron.: A fixed star of the second magnitude, called also Beta Libræ. It is of a pale emerald color.

zubenesch, s. [ZUBEN EL GENUBI.]

zuche (z as tz), s. [Etym. doubtful.] A stump of a tree.

zû-chêt-tô, s. [Ital. zucchetta=a small gourd, anything resembling a gourd in shape, from zucca=a gourd.]

Rom. Catholic Ritual: The skull-cap of an ecclesiastic covering the tonsure. That of a priest is black, of a bishop or monsignor purple, of a cardinal red, and of the pope white.

zûf'-fô-lô, zû-fô-lô, subst. [Italian zufolo, from zufolare=to hiss or whistle.]

Music: A small flute or flageolet, especially one used in teaching young birds to warble airs, by repeatedly playing them in the presence of the pupil.

Zû-lâ, s. [Native name.] A member of a warlike branch of the Kaffir race inhabiting a territory in South Africa, on the coast of the Indian Ocean immediately north of the British colony of Natal.

¶ Also used adjectively; as the Zulu war.

zûm-boô'-rûk, s. [Hind. zamburak; Mahratta jambura=a swivel.]

Min.: A small cannon supported by a swiveled rest on the back of a camel, whence it is fired.

zûm'-ic, a. [Gr. zumē=leaven.] Produced by fermentation.

zumic-acid, s.

Chem.: A name formerly applied to the acid produced in the fermentation of amylaceous substances, and now known to be impure lactic acid.

zû-mô-lôg'-ic-âl, a. [ZYMOLÓGIC.]

zû-môl'-ô-gíst, s. [ZYMOLÓGIST.]

zû-môl'-ô-gý, s. [ZYMOLÓGÝ.]

zû-môm'-ê-têr, zû-mô-sim'-ê-têr, s. [ZYMOMETER.]

zûr'-lîte, s. [After Signor Zurlo; suff. -ite (Min.).]

Min.: A variety of Melilite (q. v.), occurring in square or eight-sided prisms in the calcareous blocks of Monte Somma, Vesuvius.

zwiê'-şel'-ite, s. [After Zwiesel, Bavaria, where found; suff. -ite (Min.).]

Min.: A clove-brown variety of Triplite (q. v.).

Zwiñ'-gli-an, a. & s. [See def.]

A. adj.: Of, pertaining to, or introduced by Zwingli. [B.]

B. As substantive:

Church History (pl.): The followers of Ulrich Zwingli, or Zuingli, the Swiss reformer, especially in his sacramentarian doctrine. Zwingli was born at Wildhaus, in the Toggenburg, in January, 1484, the year after Luther's birth, and was ordained priest in 1506. In 1516, a year before the commencement of the German Reformation under Luther, he began to preach doctrines which were essentially those of Protestantism. In 1518 he was in conflict with Samson, a Franciscan friar and an eager salesman of Indulgences. In January, 1525, mainly through his exertions, the mass was abolished at Zurich, other cantons speedily following the example. Differences of opinion regarding the Eucharist having arisen in 1524 between the German and Swiss Reformers, Zwingli took a prominent part in the controversy with Luther at a conference at Marburg in September, 1529. On October 15, 1531, he was killed in the battle of Cappel, fought on a politico-religious question between the Protestant and the Roman Catholic Swiss cantons. Zwingli's views on the sacrament were afterwards followed or independently adopted by Calvin. The disciples of the former were called Zwinglians and Sacramentarians; they, however, preferred the name Evangelicals, which subsequently displaced the other two. They also ultimately shared in the name Protestants, which was originally limited to the German reformers.

zýg'-a-díte, s. [Gr. zygadēn=in pairs, jointly; suff. -ite (Min.).]

Min.: A variety of albite, occurring in twinned plates in fissures of clay-slate at Andreasberg, Hartz.

zý-gæ'-nâ, s. [Gr. zygaina=a fish, probably the hammer-headed shark (q. v.); see also def. 2.]

Entom.: The typical genus of the family Zygenidæ (q. v.). Antennæ of the male not pectinated, much thickened beyond the middle; fore wings elongate, green, with red streaks or spots; hind wings red, with dark margin; abdomen thick. Newman calls this Zygæna. To avoid confounding it with No. 2, Stainton calls it Anthrocera, but retains the name Zygenidæ for the family. Zygæna minos is the Transparent Burnet-moth, Z. trifolia, or loti, the Five-spotted Burnet; Z. loniceræ, the Narrow-bordered Five-spotted Burnet-moth; and Z. filipendulæ, the Six-spotted Burnet-moth. [BURNET-MOTH.]

2. Ichthy. & Palæont.: Hammer-heads, Hammer-headed Sharks; a genus of Carchariidæ, or of Zygæna (q. v.), with five species, widely distributed, but most abundant in the tropics. Anterior part of the head broad, flattened, and produced into a lobe on each side, the extremity of which is occupied by the eye; caudal fin with a pit at its root, and a single notch at its lower margin; no spiracles; nostrils on front edge of the head. Zygæna malleus is the commonest species. The genus appears first in the Chalk.

Pope wearing Zuchetto.

Zygæna Malleus.

zý-gæ'-nî-dæ, s. pl. [Mod. Lat. zygæn(a) [def. 1]; Lat. fem. pl. adj. suff. -idæ.]

Entom.: A family of Hawk-moths. Antennæ with scales or pectinated, never ending in a hook, wings scaly, the anterior ones narrow, the posterior rounded. Caterpillar destitute of a horn.

zý-gæ'-nî'-nâ, s. pl. [Mod. Lat. zygæn(a) [def. 1]; Lat. neut. pl. adj. suff. -ina.]

Ichthy.: A group of Carchariidæ, with the single genus Zygæna. [ZYGÆNA, 2.]

zýg-ân'-trûm, s. [Pref. zyg(o)-, and Lat. antrum=a cave.]

Zoöl.: A hollow in the vertebrae of serpents, by which an additional articulation is provided with the vertebra next behind. (Gloss. to Huxley's Classif. of Anim.)

zýg-a-pôph'-ý-sis, subst. [Pref. zyg-, and Eng. apophysis (q. v.).]

Anat.: Either of the two superior or the two inferior processes projecting upward and downward from a point near the junction of the pedicle and lamina in a vertebra (q. v.).

zýg-nê'-mâ, s. [Pref. zyg-, and Gr. nêma=yarn.]

Bot.: The typical genus of Zygnemidæ (q. v.). Filaments simple, with the green contents arranged in two globular or stellate masses in each cell. Conjugation by transverse processes; spores formed on one of the parent cells or in the cross branch.

zýg-nê'-mî-dæ, zýg-nê'-mâ'-çê-æ, s. pl. [Mod. Lat. zygnem(a); Latin fem. pl. adj. suff. -idæ or -aceæ.]

Bot.: A family or tribe of the sub-order Conferveæ. Cells tubular, united by their truncated extremities into jointed threads, which are at first distinct, and then brought into conjunction by the aid of transverse tubelets, which discharge the coloring matter. Green-spored Algæ abounding in fresh water. (Lindley, &c.) zý-go-, pref. [Gr. zygon=a yoke.] Yoked, joined; having processes more or less resembling a yoke.

zý-gô-bât'-is, s. [Pref. zygo-, and Gr. batis=the prickly roach.]

Palæont.: A genus of Myliobatidæ, founded on teeth, very similar to those of existing species, from the Norwich Crag and the Miocene of Switzerland. (Günther.) zý-gô-dâc'-týl-a, s. [ZYGODACTYLÆ.]

Zoöl.: A genus of Æquoridæ. Light violet-colored Medusas, seven to eight inches in diameter, and with long and fibrous dark-violet tentacles. Found in the Atlantic and the North Sea.

zý-gô-dâc'-týl-æ, s. pl. [Pref. zygo-, and Gr. daktylos=a finger, a toe.]

Ornith.: A sub-order of Picariæ, with seven families: Psittaci (Parrots), Cuculidæ (Cuckoos), Indicatoridæ (Honey Guides), Musophagidæ (Plantain-eaters), Picidæ (Wood-peckers), Rhamphastidæ (Toucans), and Capitonidæ (Barbets), all having two toes in front and two behind. Equivalent to the Scansores (q. v.) Called also Zygodactyle Picarian Birds.

zý-gô-dâc'-týle, a. [ZYGODACTYLÆ.]

1. Of or belonging to the Zygodactylæ (q. v.).

2. Having the toes disposed in pairs, two in front and two behind; as, a zygodactyle foot.

zygodactyle picarian birds, s. pl. [ZYGODACTYLÆ.]

zý-gô-dâc'-týl'-ic, zý-gô-dâc'-týl-oûs, adj. [ZYGODACTYLÆ.] Zygodactyle (q. v.).

zý-gô-dôn, s. [Pref. zyg-, and Gr. odous (genit. odontos)=a tooth.]

Bot.: The typical genus of Zygodontei. Of the species the most common is Zygodon viridissimus, which, however, does not bear fruit.

zý-gô-dôn'-tê-l, s. pl. [Mod. Lat., from zygodon (q. v.).]

Bot.: An order of Apocarpous Mosses, having a pyriform striated capsule, an abortive single or double peristome, and a dimidiate smooth veil. Widely distributed, but not numerous in species.

zý-gô'-mâ, s. [Gr. zygoma=a bolt or bar, from zygon=a yoke.]

1. Anat.: An arched and lengthened process projecting from the external surface of the squamous portion of the temporal bone, to which are attached the fleshy fibers of the temporal muscle. It is composed of a tubercle, eminencia articularis, and inferior, superior, and middle roots. The external lateral ligament of the lower jaw is attached to the tubercle.

2. Compar. Anat.: In essentially the same sense as 1. The arch is formed in most vertebrates by the jugal or yoke bone, articulating with the squamosal. The former corresponds with the cheek-bone in man.

zý-gô-mât'-ic, a. [ZYGOMA.] Of or pertaining to the zygoma (q. v.).

zygomatic-arch, s.

Anat.: An arch formed by the zygomatic process of the temporal bone and the posterior part of the malar bone. Called also the Malar-arch.

zygomatic-bone, s.

Anat.: The cheek bone.

zygomatic-fossa, s.

Anat.: The lower portion of the space bridged over by the Zygomatic-arch.

zygomatic-muscle, s.

Anat. (pl.): Two narrow subcutaneous bundles of muscular fiber, a greater and a smaller one, connecting the malar-bone with the angle of the mouth.

zygomatic-process, s.

Anat.: The zygoma (q. v.).

zygomatic-suture, s.

Anat. (pl.): The sutures uniting the processes of the temporal and cheek bones.

zý-gô-mâ-tür'-ûs, subst. [Gr. zygōma (genit. zygomatos), and oura=the tail.]

Palæont.: A synonym of Nototherium (q. v.).

zý-gô-phýl'-lâ'-çê-æ, s. pl. [Mod. Latin zygophyllum; Lat. fem. pl. adj. suff. -aceæ.]

Bot.: Bean-capers; an order of Hypogynous Exogens, alliance Rutales. Herbs, shrubs, or trees, with hard wood, and the branches often articulated; leaves opposite, unequally pinnate, rarely simple, undotted, and with stipules; flowers solitary or in twos or threes, yellow, white, blue, or red; sepals, four or five, with convolute aestivation; petals, four or five, unguiculate, at first like small scales, aestivation imbricated; stamens, twice as many as the petals, usually arising from the back of a small scale; style simple, generally with four or five furrows; stigma simple, or with four or five lobes; the ovary, which is surrounded at the base with glands or a short wavy disk, simple, with four or five furrows and four or five cells, each with two or more ovules; fruit, capsular, more rarely fleshy, with fewer seeds than there were ovules. Found in the hottest parts of both hemispheres. Known genera seven; species a hundred. (Lindley.)

zý-gô-phýl'-lê-æ, subst. pl. [Mod. Latin zygophyllum; Lat. fem. pl. adj. suff. -eæ.]

Bot.: The typical tribe of Zygophyllaceæ, having albuminous seeds.

zý-gôph'-ýl-lûm, s. [Pref. zygo-, and Gr. phyl-lon=a leaf.]

Bot.: Bean-caper; the typical genus of the tribe Zygophyllæ. Trees or shrubs, with opposite leaves, consisting of two leaflets, sometimes fleshy; flowers solitary, axillary; calyx unequally five-parted; petals five, stamens ten, each with a scale at its base; capsule five-angled, with five cells, each with a single seed. About twenty-seven species are known. They are natives of the Cape of Good Hope, the Cape de Verde Islands, and the Levant. The flowers of Zygophyllum fabago, a prostrate, greatly branched herb, are used as a substitute for capers.

bôil, bôy; pout, jôwl; cat, çell, chorus, çhin, bench; go, gem; thin, ðis; sin, aş; expect, Xenophon, exist. ph = f. -cian, -tian = şan. -tion, -sion = şûn;

The seeds of Z. simplex, an evil-smelling Indian plant, are eaten by the wild tribes of Sind and the Punjab; the Arabs beat the leaves in water, and apply the infusion to diseased eyes.

zy-gō-sau'-rūs, s. [Pref. zygo-, and Gr. saura=a lizard.]

Palæont.: A genus of Labyrinthodontia. Skull irregular, with concave sides, an obtuse snout, and a concave occipital border; it is lofty in the occipital region, while falling gradually in front and rapidly on the sides. Orbits slightly posterior, large, irregular. Premaxillary teeth two or more on each side, larger than the maxillary teeth, which are sixteen or eighteen on each side; all are conical, strong, and nearly straight, with about twenty grooves at the base. Known species one, Zygosaurus lucius, from the Zechstein (Middle Permian), of the Government of Perm in Russia. (Brit. Assoc. Rep. (1874), pp. 163, 164.)

zy-gō-sēl'-mī-dæ, s. pl. [Mod. Lat. zygoselm(is); Lat. fem. pl. adj. suff. -idæ.]

Zoology: A family of Infusoria, or Flagellata-eustomata, with six genera, mostly from fresh-water. Animalcules solitary, free-swimming, or repent; flagella two, vibratile, similar; endoplasm sometimes green; oral aperture distinct, terminal; pigment-spots frequently present.

zy-gō-sēl'-mīs, s. [Pref. zygo-, and Gr. selmis=an angler's noose made of hair.]

Zoöl.: The typical genus of Zygoselmidae (q. v.). Animalcules variable, from fresh-water; two flagella, at the base of which is the oral aperture, with a distinct tubular pharynx. One or perhaps two species.

zy-gō-sīs, s. [Gr.=a yoking, a balancing, from zygoō=to yoke, from zygon=a yoke.]

Bot.: The same as CONJUGATION (q. v.).

zy-gō-sphēne, s. [Pref. zygo-, and Gr. sphēn=a wedge.]

Zoöl.: A conical process on the front of the vertebrae of Ophidia, which fits into the zygantrum of that next in front.

zy-gō-spōre, s. [Pref. zygo-, and Greek spora, sporos=a seed.]

Bot.: The term applied by Huxley to the product of conjugation of spores when it is impossible to say which represent the male and which the female element, there being no morphological difference between the modified hyphæ which enter into relation with one another.

zy-gō-stīg'-mā, s. [Pref. zygo-, and Eng. stigma (q. v.).]

Botany:

1. Two stigmas, the branches of which adhere to each other.

2. A genus of Gentianeæ, in which this peculiarity occurs. The species are from Brazil.

zyme, s. [Gr. zymē=leaven.]

Pathol.: (See extract.)

"Corresponding with the adjective zymotic is the substantive zyme. This is a useful name, by which we refer to the poisonous cause of zymotic diseases. It is simpler than the word zymine, originally proposed by Dr. Farr; and (what is much more important) to speak of a zymotic poison as a 'zyme' does not imply the acceptance of any particular theory of disease, while, on the other hand, the use of the word 'germ' distinctly conveys the idea of some organized structure, itself the cause of disease by subsequent growth and multiplication."—Dr. Horsley, in Quain's Dict. Medicine, p. 1806.

zy'-mīc, a. [ZUMIC.]

zy'-mīne, s. [ZYME.]

Pathol.: For def. see extract under Zyme.

zy-mō-, pref. [ZYME.] Connected with or producing fermentation.

zy-mō-gēn, s. [Pref. zymo-, and Gr. gennaō=to engender, to produce.]

Chem.: Any substance or body that gives rise to an enzyme, diastase, etc.

zy-mō-gēn'-īc, a. [Eng. zymogen; -ic.] Causing fermentation; as, zymogenic bacteria.

Chem.: An old name for that portion of gluten which is insoluble in alcohol.

zy-mōm'-ē-tēr, zy-mō-sīm'-ē-tēr, s. [Prefix zymo-, or English zymos(is), and meter (q. v.).]

Chem. & Brewing: An instrument for detecting the condition and process of fermenting wort or mash.

zy'-mō-scōpe, s. [Pref. zymo-, and Gr. skopeō=to see, to observe.]

Chem.: An instrument contrived by Zenneck for testing the fermenting power of yeast, by bringing it in contact with sugar-water, and observing the quantity of carbonic anhydride evolved. (Watts.)

zy-mō-sīm'-ē-tēr, s. [ZYMOMETER.]

zy-mō-sīs, s. [Gr. zymōsis=fermentation.]

Pathology: A process analogous to that of the Torula in fermentation, by which a malarious or similar poison is introduced into the system. [ZYME.] The word is occasionally used in the sense of Zymotic Disease (q. v.).

"The necessity for employing the word zymosis does not seem to be felt as yet; but the same reasons which lead us to speak of the agent as a zyme should also guide us to use zymosis in the place of more usual periphrases."—Dr. Horsley, in Quain's Dict. Medicine, p. 1806.

zy-mōt'-īc, adj. [Gr. zymōtikos=causing to ferment.] Producing fermentation or a process akin to it.

zymotic diseases, s. pl.

Pathol.: Diseases communicable by contagion of a fermentable virus. The chief are measles, scarlet-fever, smallpox, continued fever, diphtheria, whooping-cough, croup, and erysipelas.

zy-mōt'-īc-āl-īy, adv. [Eng. zymotic; -al, -ly.] In a zymotic manner; according to the manner or nature of zymotic disease.

zym'-ūr-gy, s. [Pref. zym(o)-, and Greek ergon=work.]

Chem.: That department of technological chemistry which treats of the scientific principles of wine-making, brewing, distilling, and the preparation of yeast and vinegar, processes in which fermentation plays the principal part. (Watts.)

zy-thēp'-sar-y, s. [Gr. zythos=a kind of beer, and hepsō=to boil.] A brewery or brewhouse.

zy'-thūm, s. [Latin, from Gr. zythos=a kind of beer used by the Egyptians (Dioscor., ii. 109; cf. Herod., ii. 77); applied also to the beer of the northern nations (Diod., i. 134).] A kind of ancient malt beverage; a liquor made from malt and wheat.
